

The second secon	The second of th		gammani den ing ing ing ing ing ing ing ing ing in	Tableside Time 1
	THEI	IBRAI	RIES
00	LUMBL	A UNIT	ERSIT
				1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1
				1
		T. T. T.	The second secon

SIR JOHN FROISSART'S

CHRONICLES

OF

ENGLAND, FRANCE, SPAIN,

AND THE

ADJOINING COUNTRIES,

FROM THE LATTER PART OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD IL.
TO THE CORONATION OF HENRY IV.

NEWLY TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH EDITIONS, WITH VARIATIONS AND ADDITIONS FROM MANY CELEBRATED MSS.

By THOMAS JOHNES.

Etho fo hall telle a tale afrer a man, De mofte reherle, as neighe as ever he can, Everich worde, if it be in his charge, All speke he never so rudely and so sarge; Or elles he moste tellen his tale untreme, Or feinen thinges, or finden wordes newe.

CHAUCER'S PROLOGUE,

THE SECOND EDITION.

TO WHICH IS PREFIXED,

A LIFE OF THE AUTHOR, AN ESSAY ON HIS WORKS,

A CRITICISM ON HIS HISTORY,

AND A DISSERTATION ON HIS POETRY.

VOL. IX.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR LONGMAN, HURST, REES, AND ORME, PATERNOSTER-KOW; AND J. WHITE, FLRET-STREET.

1806.

T. DAVISON, Printer, Whitefriars.

CONTENTS

O F

THE NINTH VOLUMF.

1	CHAP. I. SIR Walter De Passac and Sir William  De Lignac advise the King of Castille  not to risk a Battle before the Arrival  of the Duke of Bourbon.—A Party of the English skirmish with the Garrison of Vilalpando.—The Duke of Lan- caster is dispirited by his own ill  Health and the great Sickness of his  Army Page  II. The Duke of Lancaster disbands his Army.—Three English Knights, having obtained Passports, wait on the King of Castille, to negotiate a Retreat for the Men at Arms through his 8	Kingdom
	III. The English Ambassadors obtain Passports from the King for their Sick to pass in Safety through Castille, or to remain there to recover their Health.
	-Many Knights and Squires die in Castille.—The Duke of Lancaster
14	dangerously ill at Sant Jago -
AP.	a 2 CH

j	Page
CHAP. IV. Sir John Holland takes Leave of the Duke of Lancaster, and returns with his Lady, through Caftille, Navarre and Bayonne, to Bordeaux.—
Sir John d'Ambreticourt goes to Paris, to accomplish a Deed of Arms with the Lord Boucicaut -	22
V. The Duke of Bourbon, on leaving Avignon, continues his March to Burgos, where he meets the King of Castille.—The Duke of Lancaster, being informed of this, addreffes himfelf to the King of Portugal.—The Duke of Bourbon, after a short Stay, takes Leave of the King of Castille, and returns to France	28
VI. The Count De Foix receives the Duke of Bourbon most magnificently, and makes him handsome Presents.—
The Men at Arms who were under Sir Walter De Passac and Sir William De Lignac fack the Town of St. Phagon, on their Departure from Castille.—The King is very wroth for this against the two Captains, who had remained with him	35
VII. The Duke of Lancaster leaves Sant Jago, for Coimbra, and thence goes to Bayonne	39
VIII. The Count d'Armagnac takes great Pains to prevail on the free Companies to give up their Forts for a Sum of Money The Count De Foix, underhand, prevents his Suc-
cefs	41
CH	IAP.

		P	age
CHAP.		A Digreffion on the Quarrel between the Houses of Brabant and Guel- dres.—The Life of Count Reginald of Gueldres and his Successors, un- til the Reign of Charles VI. of France.—The Duke of Gueldres, being an Ally of England, sends his Challenge to France.—The Cause of this Challenge	48
		Froissart returns to the Quarrel between the Houses of Brabant and Gueldres, which he had left unsinished in the preceding Chapter, and continues the History of the Dukes of Gueldres to Duke William, who sends his Challenge to Charles VI. King of France	61
	XI.	A Continuation of the History of the Quarrel between Brabant and Gueldres.—On the Death of Duke Winceslaus, the young William of Juliers, Duke of Gueldres, endeavours by every Means to regain the three Castles.—He allies himself to the King of England, because France supports the Rights of the Widow-
	XII.	Duchefs of Brabant The Duchefs of Brabant fends Ambaffadors to France for Affiftance against the Duke of Gueldres.— They arrive at the same Time the Duke's Challenge is brought, and receive favourable Answers -	74 82

	Page
CHAP. XIII. Concerning the Rumours of the Signs of Sanctity which were manifested by the Cardinal de Luxembourg after his Death.—The extraordinary
End of the King of Navarre	86
XIV. The Duke of Berry beheges Venta-dour	94
XV. The Duke of Burgundy fends four hundred Spears to the Duchess of Brabant.—They furprife and burn
the Town of Seaulle in Gueldres	95
XVI. Geronnet de Maudurant, one of the Captains of Perrot Le Béarnois, having been made Prisoner by John Bonne-Lance, at Montferrant in Auvergne, finds Means, after his Ranfom was paid, to put Le Péarnois in Possession of Montserrant	100
XVII. Perrot Le Béarnois and his Companions determine not to keep Poffession of Montserrant.—They make a Sally on fome Troops from Cler-mont, who had advanced to the Barriers of the captured Town, and instantly defeat them	120
XVIII. Perrot Le Béarnois and his Companions, having plundered Montferrant, retreat to their Forts.—His Answer to the Dauphin of Au-vergne, who complains of his having furprifed this Town during the Time Treaties were in Agitation for his leaving the Country -	124

	Page
CHAP. XIX. The Lord Lewis of Blois marries	_ the Lady Mary of Berry, and the Lord John of Berry the Princefs Mary of France, who dies shortly after.—The Death of the Lady Jane of Armagnac, Duchess of
Berry	127
XX. While the Council of France is in Deliberation whether or not to march an Army against the Duke of Gueldres, the Duke of Berry fends the Count d'Estampes to the Duke of Brittany, to endeavour to win him over to the Party of France, after having alienated himself from it by the Arrest of the Constable	130
XXI. The Castillians and French, after	9 the Departure of the Duke of Lancaster from Galicia, re-conquer, in a very fhort Time, all the Towns and Castles he had won.—The English abuse Castille, when in their own Country.
-The King of France and his Council invite the Duke of Ireland, who had fled from Eng-
5 1 D 1	138

	Page
HAP. XXII. The Council of France disagree, as to the King's going into Germany, on Account of the State of the Realm.—The Duke of	i Brittany strengthens his Garri-fons, and forms Alliances with England and the King of Na-	- varre.—The English raise a large
Army	14.2
XXIII. The Brabanters lay fiege to the	2
Town of Grave.—The Confta
ble of France gains the Town	9
of Saint Malo and Saint Mat thieu de Fine Pôterne, and gar	- rifons them with his Men	152
XXIV. The Duke of Lancaster has Inten	- tions of marrying his Daughte	r
to the Duke De La Touraine	,
Brother to the King of France	-
The Duke of Berry proposes him	-
felf for her Husband.—Th	e
Duke of Lancaster is much sa	- tisfied thereat	156
XXV. The Lord De Coucy and other Ba	t-
rons of France are fent to th	e
Duke of Brittany.—Before the	r
Arrival, he had restored to th
Officers of the Constable th	e
Places he had taken from him	162

CHAP. XXVI. While Helion De Lignac, Ambaffador from the Duke of Berry to the Duke of Lancaster, is negotiating the Marriage with his Daughter, the King of Castille fends Ambassadors privately to break it off, and to demand the Lady in Marriage for his Son.— Helion De Lignac is sent away, fador from the Duke of Berry to the Duke of Lancafter, is ne- gotiating the Marriage with his Daughter, the King of Castille fends Ambassadors privately to break it off, and to demand the Lady in Marriage for his Son.—
the Duke of Lancaster, is ne- gotiating the Marriage with his Daughter, the King of Castille sends Ambassadors privately to break it off, and to demand the Lady in Marriage for his Son.—
gotiating the Marriage with his Daughter, the King of Caftille fends Ambaffadors privately to break it off, and to demand the Lady in Marriage for his Son.— Daughter, the King of Castille fends Ambassadors privately to break it off, and to demand the Lady in Marriage for his Son.—
fends Ambassadors privately to break it off, and to demand the Lady in Marriage for his Son.—
break it off, and to demand the Lady in Marriage for his Son.—
Lady in Marriage for his Son
TT II TO T' I fout amore Helion De Lignac is ient away, the Day of their Arrival, with fome Truces respecting the Frontiers of Aquitaine 172
XXVII. The Dukes of Berry and Burgundy leave Paris for Blois, to hold a Conference with the Duke of Brittany, who meets them there.
-They perfuade him, against his Inclination, to come to Paris 182
XXVIII. Lewis of Anjou, Son to the late Duke of Anjou, Uncle to King
Charles VI. makes his public Entry into Paris as King of Sicily. — The Duke of Brittany comes there fliortly after.—Thomas Hapurgan, an Englishman, and John Des Barres, a Frenchman, perform a Deed of Arms before the King of France at Montereau fur Yonne - 186
XXIX. Perrot Le Béarnois takes the Field by Command of the Earl of Arundel, who lands his Forces at Ma-rans, near La Rochelle - 192

Pag	Ĉ
CHAP. XXX. The Rochellers skirmish with the English near Marans.—The English, after pillaging the Country round, retire with their Booty to their Fleet.—Perrot Le Béarnois does the fame to his Fort, with a great Deal of Plunder 198 XXXI. The Brabanters prefs Grave hard by their Siege.—The Gueldrians burn a Bridge the Brabanters had thrown over the Meuse, to enter Gueldres 203	5
XXXII. The Brabanters, having passed through Ravestein, enter Gueldreland, and are defeated by the Duke of GueldresThe Siege of Grave is raifed in confequence 208	1
XXXIII. The Duke of Gueldres, after the Defeat of the Brabanters, returns to Nimeguen.—On the News of this Victory, the King and Council of France fend Am-baffadors to the Emperor of Germany, the more fecurely to carry on the War against Gueldreland 215
XXXIV. The King of France and his Council permit the Duke of Brittany to return Home.—The States of Brabant fend Excuses to the King of France, for not allowing his Army to pass through their Country.—The Success of the Ambassadors with the Emperor 221
CHAP.

	Page
CHAP. XXXV. The Count De Blois fends two	G hundred Lances to ferve the King in his Expedition to Guel-dres.—The Ambafiadors bring favourable Answers from the Emperor of Germany.—The Emperor of Germany.—The King of France continues his March toward the Forest of Ardennes.—Sir Helion De Lignac makes his Report to the Duke of Berry, touching his Marriage with the Daughter of the Duke of Lancaster	229
XXXVI. The principal Barons of Scotland affemble in Arms to make War on England.—They learn from a Spy whom they take Prifoner that the English are acquainted with their Intentions -	237 XXXVII. The Scots form their Army into two Divisions; one, under the Command of Sir Archibald Douglas,marches to Carlifle, and the other to Newcastle on Tyne, commanded by the Earl of Douglas, at the Barriers of which Place, he conquers the Pennon of Sir Henry Percy	244
XXXVIII. The Earl of Douglas, when encamped before Otterbourne, is attacked by Sir Henry Percy, to re-conquer his Pennon, and a general Battle enfues -	0.16
general Dattie entities -	249

			Page
CHAP.		The Farl of Douglas, in rallying his Men who were retreating, is mortally wounded. — Sir Ralph Percy, badly wounded, furrenders to Sir John Maxwell, who puts him in the Hands of the Earl of Moray The Earl of Douglas, though mortally wounded, orders his Banner to be raifed, as the Bearer had been flain, and for-	-
è	VII	bids his lamentable State to be made known to his Men, urging them on to the Combat, by which they defeat their Enemies, and make Sir Henry Percy with many more Prifoners  The Bishop of Durham is anxious to fuccour the English and refcue Sir Henry Percy, but is so badly supported by his Men, that he is forced to retreat.—He makes Sir Henry Lindsay Prisoner, who had taken Sir Matthew Redman	267
	XLII.	The Bishop of Durham marches on the Morrow of the Battle to the Scots Camp, but retires without daring to attack it.— The Scots return to their own	One
		Country	277

		F	age
CHAP.	XLIII.	The King of France enters the Duchy of Luxembourg, on his March to Gueldres.—The Duke of Juliers, Father of the Duke of Gueldres, makes Excufes for his Son to the King of France.
		-He is graciously received, and has the Territory of Vierfon reftored to him, for which he pays Homage to the King -	286
	XLIV.	King Charles VI. quarters his Army on a friendly Footing in the Duchy of Juliers A Squire of Au-vergne is murdered by a Wood-cutter whom he is leading away
		as his Prisoner	293
	XLV.	The Duke of Juliers and Archbishop of Cologne leave the King of France, and go to the Duke of Gueldres at Nimeguen.—By their Remonstrances and Negotiations, he obtains Peace with the King of France and Duchefs
4		of Brabant	297
	XLVI.	. The Earl of Arundel and his Fleet are driven by Storms to La Palice, near La Rochelle.—The Lord Lewis De Sancerre, having had Information of this, chaces them at Sea, but in vain.—The Duke of Lancaster marries his Daughter to the Heir of Castille	305

-0.4.1
Pa	ıgε
CHAP. XLVII. The King of France, while on the	G Frontiers of Juliers, has Part of his Camp furprifed, and feveral Prisonersmade, by some German Pillagers. — The King, being twenty-one Years of Age, takes on himself the Government of his Kingdom.—He fends to the King of Castille, on hearing of the Marriage of his Son with the Daughter of the Duke of Lancaster, to remonstrate with him not to enter into any Treaties that may be prejudicial to 09
XLVIII. The Duke of Berry, being difap-pointed in his Marriage with the Daughter of the Duke of Lan-cafter, sends to the Count De Foix to demand the Daughter of the Count De Boulogne,
	1 { XLIX. Geoffry Tête-noir is wounded in the Head, at a Skirmish, and commits Excesses which cause his Death.—He makes a Will, and fubflitutes two Governors of Ventadour in his Room 3	10
L. The Duke of Gueldres is made Prisoner in Prussia; and, though delivered by the Knights of the Teutonic Order, he returns to keep his Faith to the Person 24

F	age
CHAP. LI. Sir John De Vienne, having received his Answer from the King of Caf-tille, returns to France.—The Duke of Lancaster proceeds in the Marriage of his Daughter to the Infant of Castille.—The Earl of Arundel, having made fome Cruifes on the Coasts of Normandy, returns with his Fleet to England	328
LII. The Lord Lewis De Sancerre visits the Count De Foix at Orthès.—A Deed of Arms is performed, before the Duke of Lancaster at Bordeaux, between five French and five English Men	333
LIII. The Duchess of Lancaster carries her Daughter to Castille, to marry her to the Infant.—Having found the Bones of her Father, she has them conveyed to Seville, and buried with regal Obsequies	337
LIV. The Duke of Berry negotiates fo fuccessfully with the Count De Foix, that he fends to him his Coufin of Boulogne, whom he instantly marries	340
LV. Certain prudent Men negotiate a Truce, for three Years, between the French and English, and all their Allies	345

		Fago
CHAP. LVI.	Froissart relates his T	ravels after he had left Orthès	348
LVII.	Queen Isabella of Fra	nce makes her public Entry into the	he City of Paria e e .	s e = 352

THE

CHRONICLES

OF

ENGLAND, FRANCE, SPAIN, &c.

CHAP. I.

SIR WALTER DE PASSAC AND SIR WILLIAM DE LIGNAC ADVISE THE KING OF CASTILLE NOT TO RISK A BATTLE BEFORE THE ARRIVAL OF THE DUKE OF BOURBON.—A PARTY OF THE ENGLISH SKIRMISH WITH THE GARRISON OF VILALPANDO.—THE DUKE OF LANCASTER IS DISPIRITED BY HIS OWN ILL HEALTH AND THE GREAT SICKNESS OF HIS ARMY.

THE king of Castille, on hearing that the king of Portugal and the duke of Lancaster were fast approaching with so great a force, was much alarmed, and sent for sir Walter de Passac and sir William de Lignac, to whom he said,—'I am exceedingly surprised that the duke of Bourbon is not arrived. Our enemies have taken the field, and, if no one oppose them, will destroy my whole country. My subjects are very discontented that we do not offer them combat. Tell me, my fair sirs, how I had best act.'

VOL. IX.

B

These

These two lords, who, from great experience, knew more of arms than the king, and for this had they been fent from France to Castille, replied,— Sir king, depend upon it, the duke of Bourbon will come. On his arrival, we will confider what is to be done; but, until then, do not make any preparations to meet your enemies. Let them make what excursions they please: they keep the field, and we the towns and castles, which are well provided with every thing, and garrifoned by good men at arms. They are fuffering from the heat of the fun and weather, while we enjoy the shade and refreshing breezes. They have found the country wasted, and the further they advance they will have fo much the greater fcarcity of forage. It was for the chance of their entering your country, that all the fmall forts have been demolished, wherein the farmers intended placing their wealth. This was, fir king, wifely done; for they would by their means have been enabled to keep possession of those parts where they now are; but at prefent they can find nothing but what they have brought with them, except the great heat of a burning fun, which you may be affured must foon destroy them. Though all your towns and castles are well provided and garrifoned, we can believe that fome may be attacked and won, for that is the delight of men at arms. In fuch way they love to pass their time, and for this do they seek adventures through the world. Do not, therefore, be any way cast down; for in this business, we engage, you shall not fuffer any great loss.'

This fpeech greatly comforted the king of Caftille, and he was well pleafed with them, for he felt that what they had faid was truth.

We will return to the duke of Lancaster and the king of Portugal, who, though they kept the field, would have willingly gained fome town to refresh themselves; for the foragers could not find any thing, and were forced to unite in large bodies for fear of ambuscades. They were so hard pressed, that when, in their excursions, they saw at a distance a large village, they were rejoiced, and cried out, Come quick: let us hasten to that village, where we shall find enough to forage and to enrich ourfelves.' They hastened their march; but, when arrived, they found only the bare walls: there were neither inhabitants, nor even a dog, nor fowl, fo completely had the French ruined this part of the country. They thus lost their time and expectations, and returned to their lords empty handed. Their horses were in forry condition from the want of proper food, and they were fortunate whenever they could meet with any green pastures. Some were fo feeble they could not advance, and dropt dead on the road, through famine and heat. Their masters were not in a much better condition, from fevers caused by the oppressive heat in the day, and the chill of the nights, without having any thing proper to refresh or recover themselves. it in the duke's army; for the English have a weaker constitution than the Portuguese, who bore all these difficulties without hurt, being hardy and accustomed to the climate of Castille. In this melancholy state were the English: many died of their disorders, more especially such as were not well attended, and had not wherewithal to provide proper remedies.

Sir Richard Burley, fir Thomas Percy, the lord Fitzwalter, fir Maubrun de Linieres, fir John d'Ambreticourt, Thierry and William de Soumain, with two hundred lances of fuch as were defirous to feek renown, mounted the best horses in the army, with the intent to furprise the french garrison in Vilalpando. They had heard that fir Oliver du Guefclin, constable of Castille, had with him there, in garrison, fome of the ablest knights of France. They left the army one morning, after drinking a cup, equipped like foragers, and came to a fmall brook that runs below Vilalpando, which they croffed by fpurring their horses over it. The alarm was soon spread through the town, that the English were at the barriers. You would have feen, had you been there when this was known, knights arming themfelves hastily, and advancing towards the lodgings of the constable, servants saddling horses and hurrying with them to their masters.

Sir Oliver du Guesclin would have restrained his companions from fallying forth to meet the English, had he been able; but their courage was too impetuous, so out they fallied, gallantly mounted on horses that had been inactive and well fed. Among the first were, sir John des Barres, the viscount de Besliere, sir Robert and sir John de Braquemont, sir Peter de Villaines, sir Tristan de la Jaille.

When the English had made their course before the

the town, they repassed the brook in the same manner as before, and retreated to a large fand bank, when they drew up in handsome array, about three bow-shots distant from the brook. The french knights advanced, shouting their cries, with their fpears in their rests; and, when near, the English being prepared, stuck spurs into their horses to meet them. The shock was very great; and several of each fide were unhorfed on the fand. This would not have ended fo fpeedily, and other weapons would have been reforted to when the lances failed; but the dust, from the movements of the horses, was so great and disagreeable, they could not know each other: their horses were covered with dust as well as themselves; and it was in such clouds that they could not breathe without fwallowing large mouthfuls. This caused the attack to cease, and the French and English to withdraw from the combat: the first returned to Vilalpando. There was not any one flain, nor much hurt, on either fide.

The english knights went not more than one league beyond Vilalpando before they returned to their army, when they disarmed themselves; for they were seized with severs and other disorders, which brought them to death's door.

The duke of Lancaster was greatly dispirited, and knew not how to act; for he saw his army daily wasting away, and was grieved to find that the greater and better part were confined to their beds. He himself was so unwell, that if he had not been afraid to dishearten his men, he would gladly have kept his chamber. He addressed himself to the king of Portugal, and desired him to say what, in the present circumstances, should be done; for he was much alarmed at this mortality in his army.

The king replied; 'That, from appearances, it did not feem probable the Castillians would offer them combat at this feafon; for they shewed more inclination that they flould waste themselves and their provision.' 'How then would you advise me to act?' asked the duke. 'I will tell you,' anfwered the king: 'as the weather is now fo exceedingly hot, I would advise that you march your army into Galicia, and give your men permission to recruit themselves wherever they please; but to return prepared to recommence the campaign in March or April. Endeavour to procure large reinforcements from England, under the command of one of your brothers, and provision in plenty for the winter feafon. A kingdom is not foon conquered, nor a climate instantly rendered agreeable to the constitutions of strangers. Your army will be quartered in the different towns now under your obedience, and will pass their time as well as they can.

'This may be right,' faid the duke; 'but the confequences will be, that as foon as our enemies shall know we have separated, and are acquainted that you are retired to Portugal with your army, and I with mine to St. Jago or Corunna, they will take the field; for I have heard that the king of Castille has four thousand lances, French and Bretons, and he will collect as many, or more, in his own country. Add to this, that the duke of Boure bon is on his march with two thousand men at arms, and will be eager to fignalize himself on his arrival. Now, consider, should all this force enter Galicia, what is there to oppose it? Before we can collect our men and form a junction, they will have done us considerable damage.'

'Well, then,' replied the king of Portugal, 'in the name of God, let us keep the field: my men are fresh and unhurt, and equally willing with myfelf to abide the event.' The conference now broke up; and it was refolved they would wait the arrival of the duke of Bourbon, to fee if, when he had joined the Castillians, they would offer them battle. The English and Portuguese desired nothing more eagerly; for the feafon was paffing, and the heat increafing: it was about St. John's day, when the fun is at its height, and intolerably hot, especially in Castille, Granada, and countries far to the fouth. There had not fallen any rain nor dew fince the beginning of April, fo that the whole country was burnt up. The English ate plentifully of grapes wherever they found them; and, to quench their thirst, drank of the strong wines of Castille and Portugal: but the more they drank the more they were heated; for this new beverage inflamed their livers, lungs and bowels, and was in its effect totally different from their usual liquors. The English, when at home, feed on fresh meats and good rich ale, which is a diet to keep their bodies wholefome; but now they were forced to drink hard and hot wines, of which they were not fparing, to drown drown their cares. The early part of the night is warm, from the great heat of the day, but, toward fun-rife, it is very cold, which afflicted them forely; for they flept without covering, and quite naked, from the heat of the weather, and the wine, fo that when morning came they were chilled by the change of air, which checked all perspiration, and flung them into fevers and fluxes, so as to carry them off instantly to their graves. Thus died very many of the barons and knights, as well as of the lower ranks; for these disorders spared none.

CHAP. II.

THE DUKE OF LANCASTER DISBANDS HIS ARMY.—
THREE ENGLISH KNIGHTS, HAVING OBTAINED
PASSPORTS, WAIT ON THE KING OF CASTILLE, TO NEGOTIATE A RETREAT FOR THE MEN AT ARMS THROUGH HIS KINGDOM.

GOOD or evil fortune depends upon a trifle. You may readily believe that the duke of Lancaster, having gained a footing in Castille, would never have lost, by any defeat in battle, such numbers as he was now daily doing by sickness. He himself was almost dead of the pestilence I have mentioned. Sir John Holland, constable of the army, saw, with great concern, the miserable situation it was in from this disorder, from which scarcely one escaped; and was forced, daily, to hear the complaints of high and low, in fuch terms as thefe, - Ah, my lord of Lancaster, why have you brought us to Castille? Accursed be the expedition. He does not, probably, wish that any Englishman should ever again quit his country to ferve him. He feems refolved to kick against the pricks. will have his men guard the country he has conquered; but when they shall all be dead, who will then guard it? He shews but poor knowledge of war; for, when he faw that no one came to oppose him, why did he not make an opportune retreat into Portugal or elsewhere, to avoid the losses he must now suffer; for we shall all die of the confounded diforder, and without having ftruck a blow.

Sir John Holland was much hurt on hearing fuch language, for the honour of the duke, whose daughter he had married; and, as it was increasing, he determined to remonstrate with him on their fituation, which he could, from his connection, more freely do than any other. He therefore addressed him,- 'My lord, you must immediately alter your plans, for your army is wholly laid up with fickness. If any attack should be now made on you, you could not draw any service from it; for the men are all worn down and discontented, and their horses dead. Both high and low are so discouraged by this diforder, that I repeat, you must not expect any fervice from them.' 'What can I do?' replied the duke: 'I wish to have such advice as is reasonable.' 'My lord,' faid fir John Holland, 'I think you had best give permission for your men to retire whithersoever they please; and I would advise that you yourself go to Portugal, or return to Galicia, for you are not in a state to undergo hardships.' That is well considered,' answered the duke: 'I consent to what you propose; and you may give our men notice, that I permit them to go into Castille, France, or wherever else they may choose, so they enter not into any treaty with our enemies; for I clearly see this campaign is over. Let them be fully paid for their services as far as our treasury can go, and also for the expences of their journey, and then make our chancellor deliver them their discharge.'

The constable replied, that he would fee this done. He ordered the intentions of the duke to be fignified throughout the army by found of trumpet, and gave notice to the captains to come to him with their accounts, when they would be fettled and paid, to their fatisfaction. This order was agreeable to all, particularly to those who hoped change of air would restore them to health. The barons and knights held a council how they were to return to England: by fea it was impossible, for they had no vessels, and were at a distance from any sea-port. They were befides fo emaciated and weak, from the fevers and fluxes, that they would have been unable to bear a fea voyage. Having confidered the matter well, they found they had no other choice than through France; but some faid,- 'How can we go thither? we have enemies in all the countries we must pass. First, there is Castille: we are now carrying carrying on a destructive war against it: then Navarre and Arragon. These two kingdoms are allied, the one to Castille, and the other to France. Arragon has already shewed its spite, for the sénéschal of Bourdeaux informs us, that fince our arrival in this country, he has thrown the archbilhop of Bourdeaux into prison at Barcelona, who had gone thither to demand from the king the arrears that are due to England. Should we fend to ask passports from France, the journey would take up too much time; and, when our messenger should be arrived, we have little hopes that the king, who is young, or his council, would grant them; for the constable of France, sir Oliver de Clisson, hates us mortally, and this is increased by his imagining his enemy, the duke of Brittany, intends turning to England.' Others, who were farther fighted and of more fense, faid, - Let all doubts be laid aside. The best thing we can do is to try the king of Castille, who may perhaps not only allow us to pass peaceably through his country, but also obtain for us the fame permission from Arragon, France and Navarre.

This measure was adopted, and a herald, called Derby, sent for, to whom were given letters addressed to the king of Castille. The herald set off, and followed the road to Medina del Campo, where the king then resided. When in his presence, he cast himself on his knees and presented his letters, which were written in French. When the king had read them, and understood their meaning, he smiled, and, turning to a knight who was the steward fleward of his household, said,—'Take care of this herald: he shall have his answer to-night, that he may return early to-morrow morning.'

The king entered his closet, and sent for sir Walter de Passac and sir William de Lignac, to whom he shewed the letters, and asked what answer he should send. The substance of these letters was, in a few words, as follows. Sir John Holland, constable of the english army, desired the king of Castille to send passports for three knights to come to him and return, that they might have a conference with him.

The two knights replied,—'It will, my lord, be right that you grant these passports, for then you will know what it is they want.' 'I agree to it,' faid the king, and instantly ordered a passport to be drawn out for the coming and return of six knights, if it were agreeable to the constable, with their attendants. When this was sealed with the great seal, and with the king's signet, it was given to the herald, and twenty francs with it: having received the whole, he returned to the duke of Lancaster and the constable at Orense.

The herald gave the constable the passport, who appointed fir Maubrun de Linieres, fir Thomas Moreaux and fir John d'Ambreticourt, ambassadors to the king of Castille. They set off as soon as possible, for there was much want of physicians and medicines, as well as of fresh meat for the numerous sick who were scattered in different parts. These ambassadors passed through Vilalpando, where sir Oliver du Guesclin received them handsomely, and entertained them at supper. On the morrow, one of the knights called Tintemach, a Breton, was their conductor, to secure them against the numerous parties of Bretons which were abroad.

They arrived fafely at Medina del Campo, where they found the king impatient to know what had brought them thither. When they had refreshed and dressed themselves at an hôtel that had been prepared for them, they were conducted by some knights of the household to the presence of the king, who apparently received them with pleasure. They presented him letters from the constable, but from none else; for the duke of Lancaster excused himself, and would not at this time, nor on such a subject, write to him.

The knights and squires of France were not prefent at this interview, although they were of the king's privy council, and nothing was done respecting the war without their confent. The ambassadors addressed the king, faying; 'Sir king, we are come hither on the part of the conflable of the army the duke of Lancaster has brought from England. But unfortunately very great fickneffes and mortality have befallen it: the constable therefore entreats, that you would have the goodness to open your country and towns to fuch as may defire to try change of air for the recovery of their health, if it may be recovered, and to enter your towns to recruit their strength; and if some should wish to return to England by land, he begs you would interest yourself with the kings of France and Navarre, that they may, at their own costs, freely pass through through their territories, in their way home. This is the fole object of our mission, and the request we have to make you.'

The king very graciously replied, 'We will confider what will be proper for us to do, and give you our answer.' The knights replied, they were fatisfied.

CHAP. III.

THE ENGLISH AMBASSADORS OBTAIN PASSPORTS FROM THE KING FOR THEIR SICK TO PASS IN SAFETY THROUGH CASTILLE, OR TO REMAIN THERE, TO RECOVER THEIR HEALTH.—MANY KNIGHTS AND SQUIRES DIE IN CASTILLE.—THE DUKE OF LANCASTER DANGEROUSLY ILL AT SANT JAGO.

THE english knights, on taking leave of the king, went to their lodgings, where they remained until the third day, when they returned to the palace. The king of Castille was much rejoiced at their request; for he saw there would be an end of the war for a long time, when his enemies solicited leave to march peaceably through his kingdom. He was determined what answer to make, though his council had advised otherwise; and, wishing to pay due honour to the french knights, he sent for sir Walter de Passac and sir William de Lignac. Having explained to them the object of the english knights' embassy, and the request of the constable, he demanded from them how he should act; and desired fir Walter to give him his opinion.

Sir Walter was unwilling to fpeak before the members of the council; but, as the king would have it fo, he faid,—' Sir, matters are come to the conclusion we always foretold, that your enemies would be worn down and destroyed, without ftriking a blow. Since their fick fo humbly ask affiftance and comfort in your country, you should grant their request; but on condition that, if they recover, they do not return to the duke of Lancaster or to the king of Portugal, but continue their road straight homeward, and that they engage not to bear arms against you, nor the realm of Castille, for the term of fix years. We also hope you may be fuccessful in obtaining leave for them to pass with safety through Navarre and France.

The king was well contented with this advice, for it was what he was inclined to; and he was indifferent what terms were made, so that he got rid of the English. He replied to fir Walter; 'You have loyally counfelled me, and I thank you: it shall be done as you propose.'

The english knights were sent for, and conducted into the presence chamber, where were the king and his whole council. The bishop of Burgos, as chancellor, and a great orator, thus addressed them; 'Ye knights of England, attached to the duke of Lancaster, who have been sent hither by his constable, listen to the answer the king gives to your requests. Out of his great pity and goodnefs, he is defirous of doing to his enemies all the kindness in his power. On your return to the constable, you will tell him from the king of Castille, that he may publish, by found of trumpet, throughout his army, that this country is open and ready to receive fick or well, all knights, fquires and their attendants, who may be defirous of coming hither, on condition that, at the gates of whatever city or town they may wish to enter, they there lay afide their armour and arms, when they will be conducted, by those ordered for the purpose, to hotels prepared for them. They will then have their names written down and delivered to the governor, in order that those who may have refided in any towns may not, on any pretext whatever, return to Galicia or Portugal, but quit the country as foon as may be. In addition, the king of Castille engages to obtain a safe passage for fuch as may intend to go to Calais, or any other fea-port they may choose, in Brittany, Saintonge, Normandy or Picardy, through the kingdoms of France and Navarre. It is the king's command, that those knights and squires, of whatever nation they be, who shall undertake this journey, do not bear arms against the kingdom of Castille, under any pretence, for the space of fix years: this they will folemnly fwear to observe at the time the passports are delivered to them. You will carry with you all these conditions, fairly written, to the constable, and to your companions who have sent you hither.

The knights thanked the king and his council for the answer they had received, but added, 'they would not say that all the conditions should be accepted: if they were not, they would fend back their herald; and, should he not return, they might conclude the whole were accepted.' 'We are satisfied,' replied the council.

The king withdrew to his closet; but fir Walter de Passac and sir William de Lignac remained with the knights, and conducted them to a handsome apartment where a dinner was provided for them. They all dined together: when dinner was over, they partook of wines and spices in the king's closet, and then took their leave, as their passes were ready for them. On their return to their hôtel, they instantly mounted their horses; for the king's harbingers had supplied them with all things at his expense, and, leaving Medina, they rode to Villeclope, where they lay that night. On the morrow, they dined at Vilalpando, and lay at Noya. The next day they came to Orenfe, where they found the constable. During the time they had been on this embaffy, the lord Fitzwalter *, one of the greatest barons in the duke's army, had died: he was a valiant knight, and much lamented; but none can strive against death. His obfequies were very honourably performed, and the king of Portugal and the duke of Lancaster attended them.

* Lord Fitzwalter. See Dugdale, who mentions his gallantry in the attack on the block-house, before Brest, but omits taking notice of his death in Spain. Indeed he only says, that—'he departed this life the year ensuing (10th Richard II.) on a Wednesday preceding the feast of St. Michael.'

This does not tally with the feason of the year when the heats are so great in Spain.

The three knights waited on the duke, to flew him their papers, and relate what they had feen and heard. Some faid, the conditions were hard; but others denied it, and faid they were courteous enough, confidering the fituation and danger they were in. It was known in the army, that the duke would discharge all who defired it, and that they might enter Castille with safety. Those who were ill, or feeble, and wished to change the air, took leave of the duke and constable, and left the army as foon as they were able; but, before their departure, many received their whole pay in hard money, others had fuch fufficient fecurity for it, fo that they were all well contented. Some went to Vilalpando, others to Ruelles, to Noya, to Medina del Campo, to Caleforis or to St. Phagon. They were every where well received, and had lodgings found them, and had their names written down and given to the different governors in the manner I have mentioned.

The greater part of the nobility went to Vilalpando, because it was garrisoned by foreigners, Bretons, French, Normans and Poitevins, under the command of fir Oliver du Guesclin. The English had more confidence in those I have named, and with reason, than in the Castillians. Thus was the expedition of the duke of Lancaster put an end to, and every one sought the best he could for himself. You may suppose this was a bitter disappointment to the duke, for he saw all his ambitious expectations annihilated: he bore, however, his misfortune like a gallant prince as he was, for he perceived he could not any way amend it.

The king of Portugal, finding the bufiness was over, dismissed his army, retaining only three hundred spears, and lest Orense, with the duke of Lancaster, who returned with his duchess to Sant Jago de Compostella.

The king remained there with them four days: on the fifth he departed, with all who had accompanied him, for Oporto, where his queen refided.

I must now relate what befel many of those knights and squires who, on leaving the duke, had retired into Castille, and were lodged in different towns. Those who had been afflicted with the disorder, notwithstanding they had changed the air and medicines, could never recover, and several died in Vilalpando. Many barons and knights of England died in their beds, to the great loss of their country, while the king of Castille was obtaining for them passports to travel through Navarre and France; but the distance, and other obstacles, delayed the accomplishment.

Three great and powerful barons died at Vilalpando; fir Richard Burley, who had been chief marshal of the army, the lord Poinings*, and fir

* Lord Poinings. See Dugdale.

Henry Percy, cousin-german to the earl of Northumberland. Sir Maubrun de Linieres died at Noya: he was a valiant and able knight from Lord Talbot*, a great baron in Wales, died at Ruelles: and of this pestilence there died, in different places, twelve potent barons, full eighty knights, and two hundred fquires, all gentlemen. Confider what an unfortunate lofs this was, and to be fustained without having a battle or striking a blow. Of archers and other men, upwards of five hundred died; and I was told by an english knight with whom I conversed, on his return through France, whose name was fir Thomas Queensbury, that of fifteen hundred men at arms and about four thousand archers whom the duke of Lancaster had brought with him from England, not one half ever returned home.

The duke of Lancaster fell dangerously sick, and became very low spirited, at Sant Jago. He was so ill, that it was frequently reported through Castille and France that he was dead: indeed, he very narrowly escaped. Thierry de Soumain, who was of great valour and squire of the body to the duke, was attacked by this disorder, and died at Betancos. He was born in Hainault, and his death was much bewailed. His brother William continually attended him during his illness, by which he ran great risk of his life. You must know, that there were none so bold, so rich or so fair, but were asraid, and were daily expecting death. The disorder solely attacked the duke's army, for the French were no way affected. This caused great murmurings among them and the Castillians: they faid, 'The king allows these English to recruit themselves in his towns, which may cost us dear by their bringing the disorder among us.' But others replied, 'They are Christians like ourselves, and we ought to have compassion on each other.' True it is, that at this period a french knight died in Castille, who was greatly lamented; for he was courteous, gallant and bold in arms: his name was fir John de Roye, and he was brother-german to fir Tristan, sir Reginald and sir Lancelot de Roye-I will relate the cause of his death. While in garrison in a town of Castille, called Segbonne, he had an imposthume in his body. Being young and lufty, he paid no attention to it, and one day mounting his courfer, in galloping him over the plains, this imposthume broke. On his return, he was laid on the bed, and all feemed well, but on the fourth day he died. There were very great lamentations made after him by all his friends: he was deferving of them for his amiable character and gallantry in arms.

* This must be a mistake, for lord Talbot did not die until the 20th Richard II.—Dugdale.

CHAP. IV.

SIR JOHN HOLLAND TAKES LEAVE OF THE DUKE OF LANCASTER, AND RETURNS WITH HIS LADY, THROUGH CASTILLE, NAVARRE AND BAYONNE, TO BORDEAUX.—SIR JOHN D'AMBRETICOURT GOES TO PARIS, TO ACCOMPLISH A DEED OF ARMS WITH THE LORD BOUCKAUT.

NOTWITHSTANDING this disorder was so very infectious that the greater part of the English fled from it, fir John Holland and several knights and fquires remained with the duke. The knights, feeing there was an end to the war, were impatient to change the air, and faid to the constable, - Sir, permit us to set out on our return to Bayonne or Bordeaux, to escape the effect of this pestilence, for our lord of Lancaster desires it. When he shall wish to have our fervices, he can eafily fo do by writing his commands; and we shall ferve him more effectually when we have recovered our health than in the state of languor we now fatally experience.' They repeated this fo often that fir John Holland told the duke of their discontents. The duke answered, - Sir John, I am willing that you and fuch knights as choose, fet out on your return home, and that you take all our people with you. Recommend me to my lord the king, and and falute from me my brothers, and fuch and fuch perfons, whom he named.'

'I will cheerfully do fo,' replied the constable; but, my lord, are you aware, that though the council of Castille has handsomely allowed our fick to enter any towns they may please for the recovery of their health, they must not, when well, return to you in Galicia, nor in Portugal? And if we pass through France, in our road to Calais, the french knights of the council of Castille have conditioned that we do not arm against France for the space of six years, unless the king of England command in person.'

' Sir John,' faid the duke, ' you must know that the French, whenever they have an opportunity, will take every advantage over us. But I will tell you how you shall act. You will pass through Castille in a courteous manner, and, when you shall be on the frontiers of Navarre, send to the king: he is our coufin: formerly we were strongly united, and the connection is not broken; for, ever fince we bore arms for him in his war against our adverfary of Castille, we have constantly kept up a mutual correspondence, like cousins and friends. We have never had any quarrel, nor have we, like the French, made war upon him. For these reasons, he will readily grant permission for you and your men to pass through his country. On your arrival at St. Jean du Pied des Ports, take the road through Bifcay to Bayonne: that is our inheritance: and thence you may go to Bordeaux without any danger from the French, to refresh yourselves.

yourselves. When recovered, you may there embark, traverse the deep, and land in Cornwall or Southampton, as the wind may be favourable.'

Sir John replied, he would punctually follow the plan he had laid down, and began to make his preparations accordingly. It was not long after this that the constable, with all the men at arms and others, took their departure; and the duke and duchefs remained at Sant Jago, attended by their household only. Sir John Holland carried his lady with him, and arrived at the city of Camores*, which is large and handsome, where he met the king of Castille, sir Walter de Passac and fir William de Lignac. They politely received him and his company, as lords do when they meet. In truth, the king was more rejoiced at the departure of the English than at their arrival; for it feemed clear to him that the war was completely at an end, and that the duke of Lancaster would never be able to bring again fo large a force to Castille from England, for he was well informed how much that country was disunited within itfelf.

When the English, who had retired to the towns in Castille for the recovery of their healths, heard that fir John Holland was on his march with the remnant of the army homeward, they were greatly rejoiced, and made instant preparations to join him. Among the number were, the lord de Chameaux†, fir Thomas Percy, the lord de

* Camores. Q. † Lord de Chameaux. Q. Camois. Leluyton

Leluyton* and the lord Bradestan, with many more, to the amount of a thousand horse. Those that were fick looked on themselves as half recovered the moment their hopes were raised of returning to England, so much had they of late suffered.

When fir John Holland took leave of the king of Castille, he shewed to him and his barons much affection, and gallantly presented them with hand-fome mules: he likewise ordered all the expenses of their journey to be defrayed.

On their departure, they took the road to St. Phagon, where they rested three days: they were well received in all places they passed; for they were accompanied by some knights of the king's household, who paid for whatever they wanted or wished. They continued their route until they were out of Cassille, and arrived at Najara, where the famous battle had been fought, then they proceeded to Pamiers† and Logrogno, where they halted; for they were uncertain if the king of Navarre would allow them to pass through his kingdom.

They deputed to him two knights, whose names were sir Peter Bisset and sir William Norwich, who found the king at Tudela. They had an interview with him, and managed so well, they obtained permission to pass, on paying for whatever they should want. When the knights returned, they left Logrogno, for Pampeluna, and passed the Pyrenées at Roncesvalles: they then quitted the road for Béarn, and took that through Biseay, for Bayonne, where they arrived. Sir John Holland and his countes remained there a confiderable time, but several of his countrymen continued their route to Bordeaux. Thus ended this expedition of the duke of Lancaster.

* Lord Leluyton. Q.

It happened, during the most active part of the campaign in Castille, when knights and squires were eager after adventures and deeds of arms, that the lord Boucicaut had taken the field, and had sent a herald to demand from fir John d'Ambreticourt three courses with spears on horseback. Sir John had agreed to meet him, with the addition of three courses with daggers, and the same with battle-axes, all on horseback. Sir John, having so readily assented, sought for him every where; but I know not for what reason he had not advanced to that part of the country. I do not, however, say, nor mean to say, that the lord Boucicaut was not equal to such a challenge, nor even to one of more hardy adventure.

When fir John d'Ambreticourt was at Bayonne, with fir John Holland, he thought much on this challenge, which, having accepted, he confidered himself bound to accomplish; and that he could not honourably leave France without doing so, lest the French might say he had returned to England dishonourably. He consulted his companions, but especially fir John Holland, how to act. He was advised to pass through France, as he had a good passport, which the duke of Bourbon had obtained for him, and go to Paris in fearch of the lord Boucicaut: he might hear of him on his road, or at Paris, and the matter would be fettled to his honour.

This advice being agreeable to him, he departed, and took the road through the country of the Basques, and came to Orthès in Béarn, where he found the count de Foix. The count received him handfomely, detained him fome fhort time, and, on his going away, prefented him with two hundred florins and a very fine horse. d'Ambreticourt continued his road through Béarn, Bigorre, the Toulousain and Carcassonois. was accompanied by William de Soumain and other fquires from Hainault, who were returning to their own country. On their arrival at Paris, he learnt that the king was at that moment in Normandy, and the lord Boucicaut, as they faid, in Arragon. Sir John, to acquit himself honourably, waited on the principal barons of France that were then at Paris, and having staid there eight days to amuse himself, he continued his journey to Calais, and those from Hainault went home. Thus were the different captains of the army of Castille feparated.

CHAP. V.

THE DUKE OF BOURBON, ON LEAVING AVIGNON, CONTINUES HIS MARCH TO BURGOS, WHERE HE MEETS THE KING OF CASTILLE.—THE DUKE OF LANCASTER BEING INFORMED OF THIS, ADDRESSES HIMSELF TO THE KING OF PORTUGAL.—THE DUKE OF BOURBON, AFTER A SHORT STAY, TAKES LEAVE OF THE KING OF CASTILLE, AND RETURNS TO FRANCE.

THE duke of Bourbon, who had been nominated commander in chief of the French in Castille, was duly informed of every thing that was passing; but, had he imagined the king of Castille had been fo much preffed, he would have haftened his march; for he had taken a long time on his journey, and, beside, had followed a round-about road. He went first to Avignon, to visit the person who stiled himfelf pope Clement, where he staid some time, then to Montpelier, where he halted five days, and as many at Bezieres and Carcassone; from thence he went to Narbonne and Perpignan, and entered Arragon; for he was defirous of feeing the young king of Arragon and his coufin, the lady Jolante de Bar. The duke continued his journey to Barcelona, where he met the king and queen of Arragon, with with a numerous body of earls and barons of the country, who had come thither to receive and feaft him.

When he had been thus entertained for the space of fix days, he departed, and went to Valencia. was there he first heard that the english army had retreated, and that fir John Holland had led the greater part into Navarre; that there had been a great mortality among the English; and that his cousin, the duke of Lancaster, lay dangerously ill at Sant Jago: the report was, that he was actually Notwithstanding this intelligence, which rendered his march useless, he continued advancing, and informed the king of Castille of his arrival, who was much rejoiced thereat, and appointed the city of Burgos for their place of meeting. The king ordered all things to be properly prepared in that city for his reception, and went thither; for many of the French, who were with him, were anxious to fee the duke of Bourbon. The duke. having passed Valencia and Saragossa, entered Castille and came to Burgos. He was most kindly received by the king, barons and prelates of the realm. Sir Oliver du Guesclin, constable of Cattille, sir William de Lignac, sir Walterde Passac, fir John des Barres, fir John and fir Reginald de Roye, and feveral knights of France, were prefent, who had left their garrifons to meet the duke of Bourbon. They had no longer any fears of the English or Portuguese, for they had all retreated, and the English had already given up those towns they had conquered in Galicia; for they knew that, as their army had left the country, they could not withstand the power of France.

The news was carried to Galicia that the duke of Bourbon was arrived in Caftille, with a large body of men at arms from France; and, as it was spoken of, this force was multiplied to more than double its number. The country, at first, was alarmed, lest the duke of Bourbon should march thither to reconquer fuch towns as had furrendered; and though the duke of Lancaster was with them, and comforted them as much as he could, they could not get rid of their fears.

When the duke of Lancaster heard his cousin, the duke of Bourbon, was with the king of Castille at Burgos, he instantly fent to the king of Portugal, to entreat he would not difband his army; for he knew not what the French might intend, now the country was in fo defenceless a state.

The king of Portugal, having difmiffed his army, was defirous to oblige the duke, from the connection between them, and left Lifbon for Coimbra, whence he issued a summons, for all men at arms instantly to prepare themselves and march to Oporto, to the affiftance of the duke of Lancaster, whose illness would not fuffer him to take the field in perfon, although he was daily recovering his health.

The duke of Bourbon remained with the king of Castille at Burgos, where he received the greatest honours from the king, the barons and lords of the Many councils were held, as to what they should now do: whether to enter Galicia or return to France. The king and his ministers faw very clearly which was most to their advantage, and faid, when together,—'Our country is ruined and wasted by the French; and although they have defended it against the English, we have paid dear enough. It will be but just we thank the duke of Bourbon for the trouble he has had in coming hither, and entreat him, through affection to us, to withdraw his men, for there was not now any appearance of war to detain them; that as for Galicia, they could invade and conquer that province themselves, whenever they pleafed, as it was a trifling matter.' The king's ministers added; 'If we keep these men, they will expect pay, and, if that be not given to them, they will rob and plunder the country. There are, already, many discontents on this subject; and it behoves us to difmifs them in a handsome manner.

This measure was adopted; for the king knew well that his kingdom could not be hurt, without his suffering from it. The archbishop of Burgos therefore, in the presence of the king and many knights from France, proposed the matter to the duke of Bourbon. The duke, as well as his knights, instantly agreed to it; for they most certainly preferred returning to France, which is a different country in all respects from Castille, and gave their orders accordingly.

The duke of Bourbon, though he came the last, was the first to return, and declared his intentions were, to pass through Navarre, that his people might make preparations for so doing. On taking his leave of the king, very rich presents were made him: he might have had more, had he chosen it, but he refused several that were pressed on him, and accepted only mules, horses, and dogs called Allans * in Castille.

Proclamation was made for all perfons to leave Castille and return to France, according to the orders which had been given by the commander in chief; but fir Oliver du Guesclin and the marshal, with about three hundred lances, Bretons, Poitevins and Saintongers, were to remain behind. The duke of Bourbon, having taken leave of the king, queen, and barons, was escorted as far as Logrogno, when he entered Navarre. Wherever he passed, he was most honourably received, for the duke was courteous, gallant and much renowned.

The king of Navarre entertained him very kindly, and shewed not any appearance of the hatred he bore to the king of France for having seized his inheritance of the county d'Evreux in Normandy. He knew that the present king, who was so nearly related to the duke of Bourbon, was no way to blame, for at the time he was an infant. He mentioned his complaints in an amicable manner to the duke, and entreated him to mediate between him and his cousin of France, for which he should hold himself much obliged. The duke promised to use his endeavours; and on this they parted, and the duke continued his journey with his men at arms peaceably through Navarre, and, having crossed the mountains at Roncesvalles and traversed the country of Basques, entered Béarn at Sauveterre.

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;Allan,—a kind of big, firong, thick-headed and fhortfnouted dog; the brood whereof came first out of Albania, old Epirus.'

&#x27;Allan de boucherie, like a mastisf,—Allan gentil, somewhat like a greyhound,—Allan sautre, a cur to bait wolves, &c.'—COTGRAVE'S DICTIONARY.

CHAP. VI.

THE COUNT DE FOIX RECEIVES THE DUKE OF BOURBON MOST MAGNIFICENTLY, AND MAKES HIM HANDSOME PRESENTS.—THE MEN AT ARMS WHO WERE UNDER SIR WALTER DE PASSAC AND SIR WILLIAM DE LIGNAC SACK THE TOWN OF ST. PHAGON, ON THEIR DEPARTURE FROM CASTILLE.—THE KING IS VERY WROTH FOR THIS AGAINST THE TWO CAPTAINS, WHO HAD REMAINED WITH HIM.

COUNT Gaston de Foix was well pleased, on hearing the duke of Bourbon was at Sauveterre. He summoned to Orthès, where he resided, a gallant company of chivalry, and set out with a grand array of five hundred knights and squires excellently mounted. They had advanced two leagues before they met the duke, who was likewise attended by a large company of knights and squires. On their meeting, they embraced and shewed every token of friendship, such as well-educated princes Vol. IX.

know how to do. After they had conversed together a fhort space, as I was informed when at Orthès, the count de Foix withdrew with his company into the plain, but the duke remained where they had met. Then three knights, fir Espaign de Lyon, fir Peter Campestan and fir Menault de Nouailles advanced to the duke, and faid,- 'My lord, we come to offer you a present from the count de Foix on your return from Castille, as he knows you have been at a heavy expense. He first welcomes you to his country of Béarn, and prefents you with eight thousand florins, this mule, two coursers and two palfreys.' 'My fair firs,' replied the duke, 'I am very much obliged to the count de Foix. With regard to the florins, we cannot receive them; but as for the rest we accept them with great pleafure.' The florins were therefore returned, and the horses and mule kept. Shortly afterward, the count placed himself beside the duke, and conducted him, under his pennon, to Orthès, when he was lodged in the castle, and his attendants in the town.

The duke of Bourbon remained for three days at Orthès, magnificently entertained with dinners and fuppers. The count de Foix shewed him good part of his state, which would recommend him to such a person as the duke of Bourbon. On the fourth day, he took his leave and departed. The count made many presents to the knights and squires attached to the duke, and to such an extent that I was told this visit of the duke of Bourbon cost him ten thousand francs.

The duke took his road to France by Montpelier, the city of Puy, and county of Forêts, of which he was lord in right of his duchefs. Though the duke of Bourbon had thus left Castille, the men at arms under fir William de Lignac and fir Walter de Passac were not impatient to do so. They were upwards of three thousand spears and fix thousand others, who in finall parties were daily quitting the country. Many of them, having expended their pay, and being weary of the war, fet out on their return ill mounted and in rags, fo that the meeting them was unfortunate, for they difinounted fuch as were on horfeback, and made war on all paffengers. and on whoever had remained in the open country, whether churchmen or not, and plundered them, under the pretext that the king of Castille had not given them their pay, and that they had been ruined by the war. They faid they would pay themselves, and all towns not well inclosed were under great alarms.

Every place shut its gates against them, for whatever they could find was seized on unless well fought for. Such knights and squires as returned through Foix, and waited on the count, were well received by him, and received magnificent presents. I was told that this expedition, including the going to Castille and return, cost the count de Foix, by his liberalities, upwards of forty thousand francs.

After the departure of the duke of Bourbon, an accident befel the town of St. Phagon, that I am about to relate, which caused the deaths of five hundred men. You must know, that when fir

D 2 William

William de Lignac and fir Walter de Passac first came into Castille, their force, which was very confiderable, quartered themselves over the country near St. Phagon, which is rich, and abundant in all forts of provision.

Among these men at arms were many Bretons, Poitevins, Saintongers, who, riding first to St. Phagon, entered the town in parties of six, ten, sifteen and twenty, so that at last they amounted to more than sive hundred, including servants. As they entered, they lodged themselves, and began to pillage and pack up every valuable they could find.

The inhabitants, noticing their conduct, fecretly closed their gates, that no more should enter; and, when these strangers thought to repose themselves, the townsmen cried, 'To arms!' and, entering the chambers where they lay, slew them without pity or mercy: happy were they who could escape, for they murdered upwards of five hundred.

News of this was brought, in the morning, to the french lords quartered near the town, and they held a council to confider how they should act. They thought it improper at the moment to retaliate on them for this conduct, for if they should begin by burning towns and villages, the whole country would rife against them, to the great joy of their enemies; but they determined that, when the expedition should be ended, and they on their return, they would then talk to them, and make them pay severely.

When this army was on its return to France, which included all except those who remained with Er Oliver du Guesclin, they said among themselves, Our arrival at St. Phagon cost us dear, but they shall fully repay us on our return.' They were all of this mind, and, having affembled about one thoufand, they entered the town, as there was neither guard nor watch; for the townsmen had forgotten what had paffed, and hoped the French had done fo likewife, and that no more quarrels would happen between them. It was not fo, to their great lofs; for, when they thought themselves secure, the cry of 'To arms!' refounded from more than one hundred places, accompanied with voices shouting. Let us kill and destroy all the scoundrels of this town, and plunder what they may have, in revenge for their murders of our countrymen.' The Bretons instantly began to put these threats into execution, and to enter every house where they expected pillage, killing the inhabitants, breaking open desks and trunks, and doing every mischief in their power. There were, this day, more than four hundred flaughtered, the town robbed and half burned, which was a great pity. Such was the revenge the companions took on St. Phagon, and then marched away.

Intelligence was fent to the king of Castille that the men at arms, who had been under fir William de Lignac and fir Walter de Passac, had, on their return, pillaged the good town of St. Phagon, murdered upwards of four hundred of its inhabitants, and set the town on fire. They added, that if the English had taken it even by storm, they would not have treated it so cruelly. At the time this was with him, and were feverely reprimanded by him and his council. They excused themselves, saying, — That as God may help them, they were ignorant of the intentions of their men: they had, indeed, heard they were much displeased with the inhabitants of St. Phagon, who, on their coming to Castille, had murdered many of their companions, for which revenge had lurked in their hearts; but that, in truth, they thought it had been forgotten.

The king of Castille was forced to pass it over, as it might have cost him more had he thought of punishing it; but he was very ill pleased with these two commanders, which he shewed, when they took leave of him to return to France. Had he been contented with them, it may be supposed they would have had more magnificent presents. The duke of Bourbon, his knights and squires, having quitted the king to his satisfaction, and left the country first, had carried off the slower of the presents.

The French marched out of Castille in various directions, some through Biscay, others through Arragon. Many knights and squires, who had lived on their pay, disdaining to plunder, returned poor and forrily mounted; while others, who had seized on whatever they could meet with, were well furnished with gold and silver, and heavy trunks. Thus it happens, in these adventures, some gain and others lose. The king of Castille was very much rejoiced when he found himself and kingdom freed from such men.

CHAP. VII.

THE DUKE OF LANCASTER LEAVES SANT JAGO, FOR COIMBRA, AND THENCE GOES TO BAYONNE.

WE will return to the duke of Lancaster, whom we left ill in bed at Sant Jago, where he refided with his duchefs and daughter Catharine. You may suppose, the duke felt many mortifications, from the complete failure of his hopes of the crown of Castille, and the great loss of his chivalry, whom he daily and nightly lamented, and whom he had brought with fuch difficulty from England. He had now no expectation of making a treaty of peace that should allow the duchess any right to the crown, or yield up, by way of composition, to her any part of the kingdom; for he had heard from pilgrims to Sant Jago, from Brabant, Hainault and other countries, who had passed through the french army in Castille, that the Castillians and French made their jokes on him, faying to the pilgrims,- 'Ye are going to Sant Jago, are ye? Ye will find there the duke of Lancaster, who, for fear of the sun, keeps his chamber. Give our compliments to him, and ask him, on his faith, if we French know how to make war, and if we have not fought him fairly, and if he be contented with us. The English used to fay, that we knew better how to dance and fing than than to fight; but the tables are now turned: it is they who repose and fing, and we keep the field and guard our frontiers, so that we have not lost any thing.'

The duke of Lancaster, like a wise man, bore all this patiently, for he could not do otherwise; and, when he was able to ride, he departed from Sant Jago with his duches and family. The king of Portugal had sent his constable, the count de Novaire, and fir John Fernando Portelet, with five hundred lances, to escort him. Among these knights were the Ponnasse d'Acunha, Egeas Colle, Vasco Martin de Merlo, Galopes Fernando, sir Alvarez Perez, John Radighos de Sar, Gaynes de Falnes, all barons. With this escort, the duke and his family left Compostella, and continued their march to Oporto, where the king and queen of Portugal were waiting for them, and entertained them handsomely.

Soon after the arrival of the duke, the king and queen left Oporto, and went to Coimbra, which is but one day's journey distant. The duke of Lancaster remained there for two months, and attended to his affairs, and to the making of preparations for his departure. By the king's orders, the high admiral of Portugal, don Alphonso Brecart, had equipped some galleys for his reception; on board of which, when the weather and wind were favourable, they embarked, and, weighing anchor, took to the deep, and in one day and a half were at Bayonne, which is upwards of seventy-two leagues. On their arrival, they were disappointed in not meeting meeting fir John Holland and the other English; but they had left it for Bordeaux, where they had embarked, and had landed in England.

The duke of Lancaster made a long residence at Bayonne, and enforced the payments of arrears, and other dues from the duchy of Aquitaine, and such parts as were under the obedience of king Richard; for he had a commission to impose and receive all taxes to his own use, and he stilled himself duke and governor of Aquitaine. We will now leave the duke and the English, until it shall be proper to return to them, and speak of other matters.

CHAP. VIII.

THE COUNT D'ARMAGNAC TAKES GREAT PAINS TO PREVAIL ON THE FREE COMPANIES TO GIVE UP THEIR FORTS FOR A SUM OF MONEY.
—THE COUNT DE FOIX, UNDERHAND, PREVENTS HIS SUCCESS.

THE count d'Armagnac, at this period, resided in Auvergne, and was negotiating with such free companions as held forts in Auvergne, Quercy and Limousin. The count took great pains, from his attachment to France, to make the leaders of these garrisons, who did great mischief to the country, surrender them up, and depart to other places. All the captains, except Geoffry Tête-noir, who held Ventadour, feemed willing to accept his terms, and receive, in one fum, two hundred and fifty thousand francs. On payment of this fum, they were all to quit the country, which would gladly have feen them depart; for the inhabitants could not till the earth, nor carry on trade, for fear of these pillagers, unless they had entered into composition with them, according to their wealth and rank; and these compositions amounted, in the year, to as much as was now demanded for the evacuation of the forts.

Although these garrisons made war under pretext of being English, there were very sew of that nation; but the greater part Gascons, Germans and Foixiens, and from different countries, who had united together to do mischief.

When this treaty had been fully concluded with all the captains, except Geoffry Tête-noir, the count d'Armagnac entreated the count dauphin d'Auvergne, who was a great baron and able negotiator, to join him in this treaty, and from his affection to him, to undertake a journey to Paris, to the king and the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, who at that time governed the kingdom, to explain what he had done in regard to these free companions, and to have their consent; for without their orders the fum of money to pay them could not be raised in the country.

The count dauphin complied with this request, and rode to Paris; but the king was gone to Rouen, whither the count followed him. He there explained plained to the king and his council the state of the country, and the treaty the count d'Armagnac had made with the companions. He did not foon accomplish the object of his coming; for the lords of the council, knowing well what fort of people thefe free companions were, had no faith in their professions, and dreaded they would not abide by any treaty. They faid to him, - Count dauphin, we know that you and the count d'Armagnac are anxious to promote every thing for the honour and advantage of the kingdom; for both of you have rich and extensive inheritances within it; but we very much suspect that these Gascons and Béarnois, when they shall have received the sums agreed for, and the country shall be weakened, will, in the course of three or four months, return, regain posfession of their castles, and commit greater waste than they have hitherto done.'

The count dauphin replied to the council,—
'My lords, it is our intention, that when this fum be raifed, it shall be deposited at Clermont or Rioms, and there remain until we have certificates of these companies having quitted the country.'

That is well faid,' answered the dukes of Berry and Burgundy: 'we are willing the money be raised and put in a place of safety; for at all events, should they result to conform to the treaty, it will serve to collect forces to make war upon them, and drive them out of their forts. This sum shall be under the direction of you, the count d'Armagnac, and the bishops of Clermont and Puy: you will take care that it be honourably disposed of, and for the advantage of the realm.' Having declared he would do fo, he took leave of the king, his uncles and council, and departing from Rouen, continued his road until he came to Clermont, where he found the count d'Armagnac, his brother and numbers of lords waiting his arrival. He related to them that the king and his council had their doubts of the captains of the free companies, and the manner this money was to be raifed, and deposited in a place of fecurity until the intentions of these captains, who by force kept possession of forts and castles in the realm, should be clearly known.

They replied, 'that fuch were their wishes; and, fince it is agreeable to the king, we will finish the business; but we must first conclude a peace or truce with the leaders, that the country may be affured the tax we are about to raife will be properly applied for their fecurity.' Commissaries were fent by the count d'Armagnac to parley with Perrot le Béarnois, and Amerigot Marcel, who were the principal chiefs of the forts on this fide the Dordogne, in conjunction with the bourg de Copane, Bernard des Isles, Olim Barbe, Abton Seghin, the lord de l'Exemplaire, and many more. These captains could never agree as to terms, for what one party acceded to in one week, the next it was refused: the reason was, that being from different countries, they had various opinions. Those from Armagnac, who were a fort of retainers to the count, readily affented to what he offered; but the greater part, and most determined pillagers, were from Béarn and Foix.

I do not mean to fay, that the count de Foix ever wished any thing but what was honourable and advantageous to France; but when he first heard of these negotiations with the captains of strong places in Auvergne, Quercy and Rouergue, he was defirous to know upon what terms they were made, and the cause why the count d'Armagnac was so bufy in the matter, and would be informed, when thefe places flould be evacuated by the companions, what road they intended to take, and where they meant to fix themselves. He was answered; 'My lord, it is the intention of the count d'Armagnac to engage these men at arms, when they shall have furrendered the forts, to lead them into Lombardy, where his brother-in-law (who, you know, married his fifter, the widow of your fon Gaston) has great difficulty in defending his inheritance, for there feems every probability of a war in Lombardy.'

The count de Foix made no answer to this, feeming not to have heard it, but turned about to others present, and conversed with them. He was not, however, the less thoughtful about what had been said, and determined secretly to prevent any of these treaties being concluded: at least, from the sequel it so appears.

The count d'Armagnac could never succeed, notwithstanding his repeated attempts, towards inducing any of the captains who were from Béarn, or Foix, to yield up their forts, or accept of any engagement, to serve the count or his brother Bernard. The count de Foix, who was prudence itself, considering that these two lords, his cousins, and those of Albreth, were very powerful, and acquiring friends on all fides, was unwilling to add to their strength by those who were his retainers: he therefore determined what line he would follow, as was told me, when at Orthès, by sir Espaign de Lyon, the bourg de Copane, captain of Carlat in Auvergne, and the bourg Anglois.

The count de Foix was at war with the Armagnacs, though at this moment there was a truce, which was ufually renewed five or fix times every year; and, should the Armagnacs and Albreths obtain the affishance of these captains of free companies, who were so hardy and cunning in war, they would be enabled to bring a large force into the field, and do the count de Foix great mischies. This was the principal cause why the captains who were dependant on him would never accept terms from the count d'Armagnac.

They indeed gave him hopes of agreeing with him; but although many appointments were made for a meeting, they kept none, but ran over the country, and pillaged it at their pleasure, just the same as before any treaty was talked of. The count was daily expecting to conclude one; and the captain he was most anxious to gain over was Perrot le Béarnois, who held the strong castle of Chalucet, and was the principal commander in Auvergne and Limousin, for his compositions extended as far as la Rochelle. The others were, William de Sainte Foix, who held Bouteville; Amerigot Marcel, who resided at Loyse, near St. Flour in Auvergne; the bourg de Copane and the bourg Anglois, who held Carlat.

Carlat. He faid, he could at any time have Amerigot Marcel; but he was defirous of gaining over Perrot le Béarnois, and Geoffry Tête-noir, who held Ventadour and was the chief of them all. They only laughed, and made their jokes of the count, difdaining to enter into any treaty with him or any one elfe. Geoffry knew his caftle was impregnable, and provided with stores and a sufficient garrison for seven or eight years; and it was not in the power of any lord to shut him up, so that he could not be prevented from making sallies whenever he chose.

Geoffry began all his paffports and treaties of compositions with, 'Geoffry Tête-noir, duke of Ventadour, count of Limousin, sovereign lord and commander of all the captains in Auvergne, Rouergue and Limousin.' I will now leave these matters, and speak of what was passing in my own country, from the peace which was granted to the ghent men, on the conclusion of their war, by the duke and duches of Burgundy, who signed and sealed it in the noble city of Tournay. To add strength to my history, I must speak of what was passing in Gueldres and Brabant; for the king of France and duke of Burgundy were much affected by the events that happened in those countries, and took great part in the war that ensued.

CHAP. IX.

A DIGRESSION ON THE QUARREL BETWEEN THE HOUSES OF BRABANT AND GUELDRES.—THE LITE OF COUNT REGINALD OF GUELDRES AND HIS SUCCESSORS, UNTIL THE REIGN OF CHARLES VI. OF FRANCE.—THE DUKE OF GUELDRES, BEING AN ALLY OF ENGLAND, SENDS HIS CHALLENGE TO FRANCE.—THE CAUSE OF THIS CHALLENGE.

THERE had been, for a long time, a hatred between the houses of Brabant and Gueldres: their countries border on each other; but the origin of this hatred of the Brabanters was on account of the town of Grave, which the dukes of Gueldres had taken possession of, and kept by force. This the Brabanters complained of, as it is fituated on their fide of the river Meufe; and, though many conferences were held on the fubject, their hatred was not abated. Those of Gueldres complained, that the duke of Brabant had, in revenge, feized on three castles on their side of the Meuse, and at the entrance of their country, called Gambet, Buct and Mille. These quarrels between the two dukes were frequently embittered; but it was the opinion of many able knights and fquires in arms, that if the lord Edward of Gueldres (who was unfortunately nately flain by an arrow from an archer of the dukes of Luxembourg or Brabant, at the battle of Juliers*,) had furvived and gained the victory, he was fo valiant, he would have reconquered these three castles.

I will now relate, according to my promife, how these castles came into the possession of Brabant, that I may embellish my history; and I will begin with speaking of the dukes of Gueldrest. It was not long before I began to indite this work, that there lived a count of Gueldres, called Reginald. Gueldres is not fo rich, nor fo extensive a country as Brabant: notwithstanding this, count Reginald, coming to his property when a young man, had every inclination for expense, and cared not what his pleasures cost him. He attended all tilts and tournaments in the greatest magnificence, and expended, yearly, four times more than his usual re-He was generous and liberal, and made extravagant prefents, fo that he borrowed from the Lombards on all fides, and was foon fo indebted he knew not whither to turn himself. His relations were greatly angered by fuch conduct, and blamed him exceedingly; but in particular the archbishop of Cologne, who was his uncle by his mother's fide. One day, when he had him in his closet, he faid,—'Reginald, my fair nephew, you have managed your affairs fo well, that you will foon find yourself a poor, man; for your lands are mortgaged all round. In this world, poor lords are not valued. Do you imagine that those to whom you have made fuch great gifts will return them to you? No, as God may help me: they will fly from you when they know you have nothing more to give, and will laugh at and mock you for your foolish expenses, and you will not find one friend to affift you. Do not depend on me; for, though I am archbishop of Cologne, I will not curtail my establishment to repair your fortune, nor give you the patrimony of the church: no, I vow to God, my conscience forbids it, and neither the pope nor cardinals will confent to it. The count of Hainault, who has not kept the state you have, has married his eldest daughter, Margaret, to Lewis of Bavaria, emperor of Germany. He has three more whom he will also marry very nobly. Had you lived as was becoming you, and had you not mortgaged your lands, towns or castles, you were a proper person for fuch an alliance; but, fituated as you now are, you will never obtain one of them. You have nothing to dower a wife with, if you had one: not even one poor lordship.'

<sup>* 1372.</sup>

† They were first created dukes of Gueldres by the emperor, Lewis of Bavaria, 1339, at Frankfort.

The earl of Gueldres was thunderstruck at this reprimand of his uncle, for he felt the truth of it. He requested, out of love to him, he would give him advice. 'Advice!' replied the archbishop: 'it is now, my fair nephew, too late: you wish to shut the stable-door when the steed is stolen. I see but one remedy for your distress.' 'And what is that?' faid the count. 'I will tell you,' answered the archbishop. 'You are much indebted to Bertaldo of Mechlin, who is at prefent the richest merchant in the world, from the great commerce he carries on with all parts of it by fea and land. His galleys and vessels fail as far as Alexandria, Cairo and Damascus, with cargoes of the value of one hundred thousand florins: he also has a mortgage on the greater part of your lands. Bertaldo has one daughter now of an age to marry, and no other children. Several great barons of Germany and other countries have demanded her in marriage, but, I know not why, unfuccessfully: he may perhaps fear fome as being too high, and others he may hold cheap: I therefore advise you to treat with Bertaldo, who may listen to you, and give you his daughter, that you may clear yourfelf of all your debts, and regain possession of your lands; for I should suppose, from your birth and in consideration of your having your possessions, between the Meufe and the Rhine, so well filled with populous towns, he will comply with your request.'

'By my faith, uncle,' replied the count, 'you advise me well, and I will follow what you have faid.'

Count Reginald, shortly after, summoned those of his friends in whom he had the greatest considence and affection, and declared to them his intentions of marrying the daughter of Bertaldo of Mechlin. He requested them to go thither and demand her, and he would make her countess of Gueldres, on such conditions as the archbishop of Cologne should be agreeable to. His friends complied

E 2

plied cheerfully, and made instant preparations for their journey to Mechlin, where they waited on Bertaldo, and told him the object of their coming. Bertaldo received these knights and clerks from the count de Gueldres very graciously, entertained them well, and faid he would confider of their de-Being fo very rich, for he was worth at least five or fix millions of florins, he was anxious for the advancement of his daughter, and, thinking he could no way ally her more nobly than to the count de Gueldres, had partly in his own mind affented to it. Before he declared it, he had many doubts, and faid to himfelf,- 'If I give Mary to the count, he will wish to be my master, and I shall no longer have a will of my own. Befide, should she have children and die, which may happen, he, who will be enriched by my wealth and re-possessed of all his lands in the country of Gueldres, may marry again, and as nobly as he pleases, and have children by this fecond wife, who, from the high blood of their mother, may hold my daughter's children in contempt, and perhaps difinherit them. I must have all these doubts cleared up before I give my confent. I will, however, mention all this to the friends of the count, and make them fuch an answer as this: That their coming has pleafed me much, and that my daughter would be very happy to be fo nobly married as to the count de Gueldres: but at this moment it was well known the affairs of the count were in the utmost disorder; that all his lands between the Meufe and Rhine were under mortgage, and that, to clear off his incumbrances, he has demanded my daughter in marriage. Before I confent to this union, I wish to know how he means to settle his estates, and that my daughter's children, should she have sons or daughters, may succeed to the inheritance of Gueldres, notwithstanding any other marriage take place in case of her death. On this point I am determined, and I must likewise have this succession assured by himself, his relations, and all who may have any claims thereto, as well as by the nobility and principal towns in the country.'

Thus did Bertaldo form the answer he was to give the commissioners from the count de Gueldres.

On the morrow, at a proper hour, Bertaldo fignified to the count's friends he was prepared with his answer. They were well pleased on hearing this, and repaired to the hôtel of Bertaldo, where every thing displayed his riches. He met them in the hall, and, after some agreeable conversation, conducted them to an apartment fitted up in a manner becoming a king, where some of his friends were affembled.

When the door was closed, Bertaldo desired them to declare the cause of their visit to him, and he would give them his answer. Upon this, the dean of Cologne, cousin to the count de Gueldres, and a valiant clerk, explained so eloquently the object of their embassy, it was a pleasure to hear him. Of his speech I need not make further mention, for the subject of it has been told, and it related solely to the advantages of this alliance, and its conveniency to both parties.

Bertaldo, who, the preceding day, had formed his plan, answered as follows: 'My fair firs, I and my daughter shall hold ourselves much honoured by fo noble an alliance as the one you have proposed; and when such matters are brought forward, the less delay afterward the better. I fay this, because an alliance by marriage, between so powerful and renowned a lord as count Reginald de Gueldres, with Mary, my daughter, pleases me right well. You require that his estate, which is now much entangled, by his debts to Lombards and others, should be cleared by this marriage, and every incumbrance done away. Thanks to God, I have the ability as well as inclination fo to do; but I must first see the following settlements fairly engroffed and fealed, fo that, hereafter, no contention enfue between any of the parties: first, my daughter's children shall inherit the country of Gueldres, comprehended within its present limits; and, if my lord Reginald should die before her, without having any heirs from her body, she shall peaceably retain the possession of that country during her life, and then it may revert to the next lawful heir. it should happen that my daughter have an heir or heirs by my much honoured prince, count Reginald, and she die before him, the count de Gueldres shall not, on account of any fecondary marriage, difinherit, or otherwise deprive the heir or heirs of my daughter of the fuccession of Gueldres. I consent, however, that if it shall be his good pleasure in such cafe to marry again, he may dower the lady with those acquired lands on the other fide of the Meufe.

Meuse, bordering on the bishoprick of Liege and duchy of Brabant, but without charging any part of the country of Gueldres. When the relations and friends of the honourable prince, count Reginald, and all those who may, from their family-connections, have any claims on the duchy of Gueldres, and the chief towns, shall have signed and sealed settlements drawn up in the manner I have mentioned, I give my consent to the marriage. You may now, therefore, make any reply you have been charged with.'

The knights from Gueldres, after some short conversation together, said; 'Sir, we have well heard your terms; but, not being commissioned to say any thing in confirmation, or otherwise, on the subject, we must be silent. We will return to our lord, and relate punctually to him and his council what you offer, and very shortly you shall have from him his answer.'

'God grant it may be favourable,' replied Bertaldo; 'for I wish it.' On this they all left the apartment and went away. As you have heard every thing that passed on this subject, I shall not dilate on it more.

When the commissioners were returned home, matters seemed likely to be soon brought to a conclusion; for the count thought, in his present situation, he could not do better than marry the daughter of Bertaldo, who was powerfully rich. For greater security, all the settlements were drawn up, and engrossed in his house: when they were sinished, the count signed and sealed them, as did all his relations whose names were mentioned therein, and the nobility and magistrates of the principal towns.

Bertaldo being now fatisfied, the marriage was confummated, the debts of the count were paid, and all his lands freed from every incumbrance, Thus was the count de Gueldres made rich: he took a new hôtel, and formed a different establishment. If, formerly, he had been thought to keep a magnificent one, this was much fuperior; for he had now wherewithal to support it, as he never wanted for any money Bertaldo could give him. The count behaved right honourably to his lady, who was very handfome, good, prudent and devout. At the end of four years, the lady died, leaving a daughter of the name of Isabella. The count, being a young man when he became a widower, married again very nobly; for king Edward of England, father of that king Edward who befieged Tournay and conquered Calais, gave him his daughter Isabella*. By this lady he had three children, two fons and a daughter, fir Reginald, fir Edward and Joan, who was afterwards duchefs of Gueldres.

When king Edward III., who was uncle to thefe

* There feems fome mistake here, but I cannot make it out, nor find, in any of the genealogical accounts of the counts of Gueldres, notice of this marriage with the daughter of the merchant Bertaldo of Mechlin.

&#x27;Reginald II., the 9th count of Gueldres, married, in 1343, Sophia, countefs of Mecheln, and 1355, Eleanora of England.'—Anderfor's Royal Genealogies.

children of Gueldres, came first into Germany to vifit the emperor, and had been appointed by him vicar-general of the empire, as is contained in the first volume of this history, the county of Gueldres was made a duchy, and the marquifate of Juliers a county, to elevate those families in dignity. But to come nearer to our times, and connect this with our history, it happened that, after the decease of this count Reginald we have been speaking of, his fon, also called Reginald, nephew to the king of England, died without heirs. Sir Edward of Gueldres fucceeded to both: he was married to the eldest daughter of duke Albert of Hainault; but fhe was fo young, that fir Edward never carnally knew her, and he died also without heirs; for, like a valiant knight, he was flain in battle, in a war against duke Winceslaus of Brabant, before Juliers.

Sir Edward's fifter-german was married to count William of Juliers, and her brother dying without iffue, she claimed Gueldres as her inheritance, and brought forward her pretensions. Her elder fifter, by the first marriage, made a similar claim, and faid, since no male heirs remained from the second marriage, the duchy became her right, according to the settlements that had been made and signed. As this dispute ran high between the two sisters, the elder was advised to unite herself, by marriage, with some person well allied, that would defend her rights.

She followed this advice, and defired the archbishop of Cologne, at that time with the lord John de Blois, whose brother, count Lewis, was still alive, to open the matter to him, and, if he were agreeable, she would make him duke of Gueldres; for, by the death of her two brothers, without male issue, the duchy had become her inheritance, and none other had any legal claim to it. The lord John de Blois, who had been brought up in Holland and Zealand, having fair inheritances there, and speaking the language, willingly listened to the propofal; for he would never marry in France, thinking he should acquire a large tract of country in the parts he liked best. The knights of his council, in Holland, advised him to accept of the lady. He confented to this; but, before he made it public, he rode to Hainault, to confult his coufin, duke Albert, and hear what he would fay to it.

Duke Albert, in truth, knew not what advice to give him, or, if he did, he kept it to himfelf, and delayed fo long, before he could make up his mind, that lord John de Blois was tired of waiting, and, mounting his horfe, rode to Gueldres, married the lady I have mentioned, and took poffession of the duchy. He was not, however, acknowledged duke by the whole country, nor were her claims universally allowed; the majority of knights, squires and chief towns, inclined more to the lady of Juliers, who, having a handsome family of children, had gained their hearts.

The lord John, therefore, had with his wife a war, which cost him much. By the death of his brother, count Lewis, he became count of Blois, lord of Avefnes in Hainault; and the rich inheritances of Holland and Zealand fell likewise to him. Notwithstanding this, his council advised him to pursue the claim of his lady on Gueldreland. He did so, to the utmost of his power; but Germans are a covetous people, and they only continued the war as long as they were duly paid. The dispute cost lord John very large sums, and was never of any service to him. This gallant count, lord John de Blois, died in the castle of the good town of Schoonhoven, in the month of June, of the year of grace 1381, and was carried to the church of the Cordeliers at Valenciennes, and buried beside his grandsather, fir John of Hainault*.

The lord Guy de Blois succeeded his brothers in all their possessions in France, Picardy, Hainault, Holland and Zealand, as well as in the country of Blois. I know not how many years the lady of lord John survived him, but, on her decease, her sister, the countess of Juliers, remained peaceable possession of the duchy of Gueldres. It was, however, settled, at the request of the nobility and inhabitants of the duchy, that lord William de Juliers, eldest son of the count of Juliers, should be duke of Gueldres; for it had reverted to him in direct succession from his uncles, and, on this account, duke Albert and his duchess had given him their daughter in marriage, who had been betrothed to duke Edward, as before mentioned.

* The lords Lewis, John and Guy, were fons of the count Guy de Blois, brother to Charles de Blois, duke of Brittany, by a daughter of fir John of Hainault, who conducted queen Isabella of France to England, with her fon Edward III.—Annotation X.—Denys Sauvage.

Thus was this lady still duchess of Gueldres, and this last marriage was the more suitable, for they were both nearly of the fame age. The duke refided constantly in his own country; but the more he increased in age the greater was his love for tilts, tournaments and fuch amufements, and he was more attached to the English than to the French, which he shewed as long as he lived. had always rankling in his breaft a fimilar hatred to what had subsisted between his ancestors, and the dukes of Brabant, and was ever feeking for occasion of quarrel with them for two reasons: one, because he was the ally of king Richard II.; the other, because Winceslaus of Bohemia, duke of Luxembourg, had purchased from the count de Mours, a great baron in Germany, those three caftles I have before mentioned, but will now mention again, to make the matter clearer, Gambet, Buet and Mille, that are fituated beyond the Meufe, on the territory of Fauquemont. The dukes of Gueldres had in former times been lords of these castles, and the present duke was much vexed that he could not add them to his inheritance, but as long as duke Winceslaus lived he kept all this to himfelf.

CHAP. X.

THE HOUSES OF BRABANT AND GUELDRES, WHICH HE HAD LEFT UNFINISHED IN THE FRECEDING-CHAPTER, AND CONTINUES THE HISTORY OF THE DUKES OF GUELDRES TO DUKE WILLIAM, WHO SENDS HIS CHALLENGE TO CHARLES VI. KING OF FRANCE.

DUKE Reginald of Gueldres, cousin-german to the prince of Wales, had mortgaged the three above-mentioned castles for a sum of storins to a great baron of Germany, called the count de Mours. He kept possession of them for a time; but, when no intention was shewn of paying back the money he had lent on their fecurity, he grew melancholy and fent legal fummons for payment to duke Reginald. But he made light of this, as he had not any money to acquit himself of the debt, which frequently happens to many great lords when they are called upon for payment. When the count de Mours perceived this, he made advances to the duke of Brabant, and offered him these castles for the money for which they were mortgaged. The duke eagerly accepted the propofal, for they were on the confines of the territory of Fauquemont, of which he was lord. The duke was defirous to increase his inheritance, for he thought furely to survive his present duchess, the lady Johanna*.

He took possession of these castles, and placed in them, as governor, the lord de Kale. When, upon the death of duke Reginald, the lord Edward fucceeded to the duchy of Gueldres, he fent ambassadors to the duke of Brabant, to request he might have his castles for the money he had paid for them. The duke, not having purchased them for this end, returned a positive refusal. The duke of Gueldres was highly indignant at this answer, and in confequence was hard on his fifter-in-law, the widow of the lord Reginald and younger fifter to the duchefs of Brabant, by preventing her from receiving her dower. The lady went to Brabant, and laid her complaints of the vexations the duke of Gueldres was occasioning her, before the duke and duchefs. On account of the long-fubfifting hatred between the Brabanters and those of Gueldres, for the seizure of Grave, the first were well inclined to aid the lady by force of arms. A large body of men at arms were indeed once collected in Brabant, and advanced to Bois le Duc, to the amount of twelve hundred spears. The duke of

* Winceslaus was the second husband of Johanna, heiress of Brabant and Limbourg. She was married to him 1355. After the death of Winceslaus, the Sth December 1384, and his son, the constituted Anthony, second son of the duke of Burgundy; her heir 1404. Her first husband, William count of Holland, died 1345 without issue.—Johanna died 1406.—Anderson's R. G.

Gueldres had likewise assembled his forces, and it was generally thought a battle would have been the consequence; but duke Albert, the count de Mours, and the count of Juliers this time interfered, and they separated without coming to blows.

This fame year, duke Winceslaus was victorious over fome free companies, who had overrun and despoiled his lands in Luxembourg: he banished many, and put to death their leader, called the little Mesclin, in the tower of the castle of Luxembourg. In this year also, the lord Charles of Bohemia, emperor of Germany, appointed the duke of Brabant chief of an inflitution called in Germany Languefride, which fignifies an affociation for the repairs and fecurity of the public roads, fo that all persons may travel from one part to another without danger. The emperor gave him also great possessions in Alface on both sides of the Rhine, that he might guard the country against the Linfars, who are a most wicked people, robbing all without mercy. He gave him likewife the fovereignty of the large city of Strasburgh, and, to add to his dignity, created him a prince of the holy roman empire. He certainly could not give him too much, for this duke Winceslaus was generous, amiable, courteous to all, and gallant in arms. Great things might have been expected from him. had he been granted longer life, but he died in the flower of his age; on account of which I, the author of this history, greatly grieve, and wish he had enjoyed a course of eighty years or more, for he would have done much good to mankind. The fchifm fchisin in the church afflicted him greatly, as he often expressed himself to me, who lived with him on the most intimate and friendly footing. And, notwithstanding that I have seen and personally known upwards of two hundred powerful princes in my various travels, I have never found any more courteous and amiable than this duke of Brabant, and my very good lord the count Guy de Blois, who commanded me to indite this chronicle. These were the two princes of my time, of the greatest liberality, humility and goodness, who lived magnificently on their revenues, without malice or any way oppressing their subjects by taxes, and issuing any hurtful edicts through their territories. But I will now return to the principal subject of this chapter.

When the dukes of Juliers and Gueldres, who were brothers by marriage, and whose hearts were too much attached to the English; for they had long been the allies of the kings of England, and ftrongly united to each other, heard of the dignities conferred by the emperor on the duke of Brabant, they were much exasperated; not from any wish to do good or correct the wicked, but that fuch honours should be conferred on their enemy: more particularly that he should have the appointment of Languefride, and execute the office with feverity, for it affected their lands. This inflitution had been first formed for the security of those merchants of Hainault, Brahant, France, Flanders and Liege, who travelled thence to Cologne, Treves, Lucca, Constance, and other cities and fairs in Germany. Merchants could not enter those countries, without risk, through the states of Juliers or Gueldres.

It happened there were some robberies committed on the highways by these Linfars, who had escaped into the territory of the duke of Juliers; and it was told me, that the duke had even lent them horses and the use of his castles. Heavy complaints were made of this to duke Winceslaus, who at that time was resident in Brussels, and that the Languefride was held in contempt; that the perfons who had violated it were retired into the duchy of Juliers, where they lived unmolested.

The duke of Brabant, at that time young and chivalrous, high in birth and rich in fortune, was greatly piqued at this conduct, and hurt by the complaints of those who had been robbed; he declared he would speedily provide a remedy, and, being nominated chief of the Languefride, would not that any blame should fall on him for negligence in the due support of it.

To be affured of the fact, and through the advice of his friends, he fent to the duke of Juliers fome of the first men in his country, such as the lord d'Urquon, the lord Bourgueval, fir Scelar archdeacon of Hainault, Geosfry de la Tour grand routier of Brabant, and several more, to remonstrate with him in an amicable manner on the impropriety of his conduct, and that proper excuses must be made for the offence, as it affected too strongly the duke of Brabant as chief of the Languefride.

The duke of Juliers paid but little attention to their remonstrances, for he seemed rather to prefer Vol. IX.

war to peace, which displeased so much the envoys from the duke of Brabant, that they took leave of him, and returned to relate all that had paffed. The duke of Brabant, having heard them, asked their advice how to act. 'Sir,' they replied, 'you know it full well yourfelf: speak your will.' 'Well then,' faid the duke, 'it is not my intention to let this matter fleep, nor shall it be faid, through cowardice or weakness of heart, I have suffered any robberies to be committed within my jurifdiction with impunity, as I will make my coufin, the duke of Juliers, and his adherents very foon feel, and that the business is personal to me.' The duke was not idle, but instantly fet clerks to work in writing letters to all from whom he expected any assistance: some he entreated, others he commanded, and gave fufficient notice to the duke of Juliers and his allies of his intentions.

Each of these lords provided themselves as ably as they could; but the duke of Juliers would have made an indifferent figure without his brother in law the duke of Gueldres, who greatly reinferced him with men at arms and friends. These two lords collected men secretly from Germany; and as the Germans are avaricious, and had not for some time had any opportunity of gain, they accepted their pay, and came in greater numbers as they were ignorant they were to be employed against the duke of Brabant.

The duke of Brabaut left Bruffels in grand array and went to Louvain, thence to Maestricht, where he found upwards of one thousand good spears waiting for him: other forces were coming to his aid from France, Flanders, Hainault, Namur, Lorraine, Bar and different parts, fo that his army amounted to full two thousand five hundred lances. Four hundred spears, under the lord of Geant, were on their march to join him from Burgundy; but they arrived too late, from not knowing when an engagement would take place, and were much vexed when they heard it was over without their being present.

While the duke of Brabant remained at Maestricht, he could not obtain any intelligence of his enemies: he therefore determined to advance and enter their lands, which he did on a Wednefday, and there encamped. He halted that day and the next, and learnt from his fcouts that the enemy had taken the field. He commanded the army to advance into the territory of Juliers and burn it. This Thursday he halted at an early hour. The van was commanded by Guy de Ligny, count de St. Paul, and the lord Waleran his son, who though very young, being no more than sixteen years old, was then made a knight.

The Brabanters encamped very close together, and, as it appeared, the Germans were better informed of their state than the Brabanters were concerning them; for, on the Friday morning, as the duke had heard mass, and all were on the plain, not thinking a battle would soon take place, the dukes of Juliers and Gueldres made their appearance, with a large and well mounted body of men at arms. The duke of Brabant was told; 'Sir, here are your enemies: put on your helmets quickly, in the name of God and St. George.' He was well pleased on hearing this; and that day he had near his person sour squires, well informed, and of courage to save such a prince, having been engaged in many deeds of arms and pitched battles: their names were John de Valcon, Baldwin de Beausort, Gerard de Bles and Orlando de Cologne.

F 2

The men of Bruffels furrounded the duke: fome were mounted with their fervants behind them, who carried flaggons of wine, and falmon, trout and eel pies, neatly packed in handsome towels attached to their faddles. These people, with their horses, filled up the place so much, that no proper orders could be given. At length, Gerard de Bles faid to the duke,—'Sir, order all these horse away that furround us: they are greatly in our way, and prevent us from knowing what is become of the van and rear division, under your marshal fir Robert de Namur.' 'I confent,' replied the duke, and gave his orders. Upon this, Gerard and his companions, fword in hand, began to lay about them, on helmets and horses, so that the place was instantly cleared; for no one would willingly have his horse wounded or killed.

To make an end of the business: the dukes of Juliers and Gueldres advanced full gallop on the van, under the command of the count de St. Paul and his son, which they broke and defeated, and many were slain and made prisoners. This division made the greatest resistance, and the count de St. Paul and his son were among the dead. Fortune was unkind to the duke of Brabant and his allies; for this battle was so fevere, few men of honour escaped death or captivity.

The duke of Brabant, fir Robert de Namur, fir Lewis, his brother, fir William de Namur, fon to the count de Namur, were made prisoners, and such numbers of others, that their enemies were fully occupied when they surrendered to them. There were many slain on the side of the duke of Juliers; but you know it is a general observation, a defeated army always suffers the most.

The Brabanters, however, had one fatisfaction in their great lofs, in the death of duke Edward of Gueldres; for it was the opinion of all, that had he furvived, he would have overrun the country, and conquered the whole, as well as Brussels, without meeting any opposition; for he was a most outrageously bold knight, and detested the Brabanters, on account of the three castles they held from him.

The duke of Juliers gained this victory on a Friday of August, the eve of St. Bartholomew's day, in the year of our Lord 1371.

The duchess of Brabant, in her distress, had recourse to king Charles V. of France, who was nephew to the duke. The king advised her to apply in person to the emperor of Germany, as being brother to the duke of Brabant, and because he had suffered in the support of the emperor's rights. The lady did so, and went to Constance, where she found the emperor, to whom she made her complaints. The emperor heard her with attention, and was bound by several reasons, to grant her relief and comfort:

comfort; first, because the duke was his brother, and because he had appointed him his vicar of the empire, and chief of the Languefride. He consoled the duchess, and told her, that before the ensuing summer were passed, he would provide an ample remedy for what had happened.

The duchefs returned to Brabant greatly comforted. The emperor, lord Charles of Bohemia, was not inactive; for, as foon as the winter was passed, he went to the noble city of Cologne, where he made such vast provision of stores, as if he were about to march to the conquest of a kingdom. He wrote to all counts and dukes who held lands under him, to meet him the third day of June, at Aix la Chapelle, each accompanied by sifty horse, under pain of forseiture of his lands for disobedience. He particularly summoned duke Albert, earl of Hainault, to Aix with sifty horse, who obeyed.

When all the lords who had been fummoned were arrived at Aix la Chapelle, the place was much crowded, and the emperor then declared he would inftantly enter the duchy of Juliers to destroy it, on account of the great outrage that had been offered him, by the duke of Juliers taking up arms against his vicar and brother; for such had been the sentence adjudged in the courts of the empire.

The archbishop of Treves, the archbishop of Cologne, the bishop of Mentz, the bishop of Liege, duke Albert of Bavaria, the duke of Austria, his brother, and many great barons of Germany, relations of the duke of Juliers, having consulted together, thought that to destroy the whole of the territories territories of fo valiant a knight was a punishment too fevere. They therefore proposed that the duke of Juliers should be summoned, and brought to acknowledge his error. This being agreed to, all parties laboured to bring about a reconciliation.

Duke Albert and his brother went to Juliers, where they found the duke fo much difmayed at this large armament of the emperor, that he knew not how to act, nor what council to follow, for he had heard it was intended against him, unless his friends exerted themselves to avert it. The duke of Juliers was much rejoiced and comforted, by the arrival of two fuch lords as duke Albert of Bavaria and the duke of Austria, his brother, beside being his relations; for he knew they would not allow him to fuffer any difgrace, but would give him the best advice for his conduct. They counfelled him as follows: to fend fome of his principal knights for his coufin, the duke of Brabant, whom he had detained a prisoner at large in the town and castle of Judeque*. When he was brought to them, these lords paid him every respect that was his due. They then all left Juliers together, and rode to Aix, where they difmounted at the hôtels which had been prepared for them.

Duke Albert, his brother, and the before-mentioned prelates, who had been mediators in this business, went to the emperor and his council, and told them, that the duke of Juliers was, of his own free will, come to wait on him, and was willing to put himself, without reservation, in his power, as he acknowledged him for his sovereign and liege lord. These humble words greatly softened the anger of the emperor, and he replied, 'Let the duke of Juliers come hither.'

* Judeque. Q. if not Gulick, Juliers.

When the duke of Juliers was in the presence of the emperor, he cast himself on his knees, and said, — 'Most redoubted and sovereign lord, I understand you are much displeased with me for having detained so long in prison your brother of Brabant. I am willing to refer the whole matter to your noble felf, and will conform to whatever may be your judgment and that of your council.'

The emperor made no answer to this speech; but his son, the king of Bohemia, replied,—'Duke of Juliers, you have behaved very outrageously, in keeping so long our uncle of Brabant prisoner; and had it not been for your well-beloved cousins, the dukes of Bavaria and Austria, who have so warmly interceded for you, this matter would have turned out very disagreeably to you, and you would have well deserved that it should do so. Continue your harangue, and manage that we be satisfied with you, and that we have never again any cause to complain of your conduct; for another time it will cost you very dear.'

The duke of Juliers was still on his knees before the emperor, seated on his imperial throne, and thus spoke: 'My very redoubted and sovereign lord, I acknowledge that I have been guilty of contempt to your imperial dignity, by raising an army, and engaging with it my coufin, your brother, the vicar of the holy empire. If the fortune of war gave me the day, and your brother was taken prifoner, I now restore him to you free of all ransom; and, if you please, there shall never again be any ill will or revenge thought on between us.'

The prelates and princes standing round, faid,— 'Most renowned lord, accept the excuses and offers which your cousin, the duke of Juliers, makes you, and let them fatisfy you.' 'We are willing to do so,' faid the emperor; and, as it was told me, in further confirmation, he took the duke of Juliers by the hand, as he rose, and kissed him on the mouth. The king of Bohemia and duke of Brabant did the same.

Thus was Winceslaus of Bohemia, duke of Luxembourg and Brabant, delivered from prison, by the power of the emperor, without ransom, as were all that had been made prisoners by the duke of Juliers, and who had not paid their ransoms, by the treaties that were drawn up in consequence of this reconciliation.

When this matter had been concluded, the affembly broke up, and all returned to their homes. The emperor went to Prague, the duke of Brabant to Bruffels. When the duke of Brabant was there arrived, he imposed a very heavy tax on the country, to make restitution to the knights and squires for some part of the losses they had suffered.

CHAP. XI.

A CONTINUATION OF THE HISTORY OF THE QUARREL BETWEEN BRABANT AND GUELDRES.—ON THE DEATH OF DUKE WINCESLAUS, THE YOUNG
WILLIAM OF JULIERS, DUKE OF GUELDRES, ENDEAVOURS BY EVERY MEANS TO REGAIN THE THREE CASTLES.—HE ALLIES HIMSELF TO THE KING OF ENGLAND, BECAUSE FRANCE SUPPORTS THE RIGHTS OF THE WIDOW-DUCHESS OF BRABANT.

I HAVE taken much pains to detail all the particulars of this matter in my history, to bring it to the point I aim at, which is to explain why king Charles of France led a powerful army into Germany. I might indeed have passed it more briefly over, if I had chosen; but the dates of all these circumstances ought to be inserted in this history. In truth, I have my own manner of relating things, which, though pleasing to me, is indisferent enough. When I learnt that the kings of France and England were about to interfere in this business, I exerted myself to examine more deeply into the subject than I had hitherto done, and shall continue it as follows.

On the return of duke Winceslaus to Brabant, freed from all dangers of prison, as you have heard, he was defirous of vifiting his states and castles, as well in the duchy of Luxembourg as elfewhere. He took therefore his road towards Alface and the city of Strasburgh, through the territory of Fauquemont. He vifited those three castles which had caused the hatred of the duke of Gueldres, and found them strong, handsome and well situated. If he liked them before, he was now still more pleafed with them, and ordered the tenants around to affift in strengthening their fortifications. employed masons, carpenters and ditchers to repair and ornament them; and, before his departure, he appointed a prudent and valiant knight, called fir John Groffet, as governor in chief, with orders to guard and defend them at his peril. The duke continued his journey through his states, stopping at various places, according to his pleafure, and then returned to Brabant, which was his fixed place of residence.

Sir John de Blois had at this period married the duchefs-dowager of Gueldres, to whom that duchy had fallen by the death of lord Edward, flain, as you have heard, at the battle of Juliers: but the duchefs of Juliers opposed her claim on Gueldres, and was supported by the majority of the nobility and principal towns; for she was more popular with them than her eldest fister because she had a sine son, of an age to defend them in war, and neither her sister nor her husband, fir John de Blois, had ever peaceable possession of the duchy. The war to support the claim of the duchefs, in which he was forced to engage, cost him upwards of one hundred hundred thousand francs; and after all William de Juliers, son to the duke of Juliers, (who had early shewn in his youth that chivalry and love of arms had descended to him by blood on both sides) remained duke of Gueldres.

An union was concluded between him and the eldest daughter of duke Albert, who was married to the lord Edward of Gueldres, but the marriage, on account of her extreme youth, had never been consummated. By this union with lord William, she remained duchess of Gueldres.

Time and feafons pass and change; and this young duke increased in honour, strength and understanding, with a great desire for deeds of arms, and a strong inclination to add to his states. His heart was more english than french, and he had declared in his younger years that he would always aid the kings of England in their wars; for, being more nearly connected by blood with them than with the kings of France, he bore them greater affection.

When his council gave him to understand that the Brabanters did him much injury by the detention of the three castles which the duke and duches held from him, he replied, 'Be it so: wait a while: every thing has its turn. It is not yet time for me to exert myself, for our cousin of Brabant has too many powerful friends; but a time may come, when I will rouse myself in earnest.'

Things remained in this state, until God was pleased to call to him duke Winceslaus, who died duke of Brabant and Luxembourg, as has been already ready related in this history. The duchess and the states suffered a great loss by the death of this gallant duke.

The young duke of Gueldres, who was now of an age to maintain his pretentions by arms against his enemies, began to take measures for the regaining these three castles, which had created such hatred between Brabant and his uncle, the lord Edward of Gueldres. He sent persons properly authorised to treat with the duchess of Brabant for the surrender of the castles on payment of the sum they had been mortgaged for: but the lady replied, that as they were now legally in her possession, she would keep them for herself and her heir, as her lawful inheritance; and that if the duke were in earnest in his professions of friendship to Brabant, he would prove it, by yielding up the town of Grave, which he unjustly detained.

The duke of Gueldres on hearing this answer, which was not very agreeable to him, was much piqued, but did not the less adhere to his plans. He now attempted to gain over to his interest the governor of those castles, sir John Grosset, by purchase or otherwise. The knight was prudent and steady: he told those who had been sent secretly to treat with him, never again to mention the subject, for, were he to die for it, he would never act dishonourably, nor be guilty of treason to his lawful fovereign.

When the duke found he had not any hopes of fucceeding with the governor, he (as I was informed) addressed addressed himself to sir Reginald d'Esconvenort, and excited such a hatred between him and sir John Grosset, for a very trisling cause, that the knight was shortly after murdered in the plains, either by sir Reginald, or by his people, or through an ambuscade, to the great vexation of the duchess of Brabant and that country. The three castles were put under another governor by order of the duchess and her council.

Affairs remained some years in this state; but their mutual hatred was privately kept up, as well for these castles as for the town of Grave. Those of Gueldres that bordered on Brabant did as much mischief as they could to their neighbours, more particularly the inhabitants of Grave, which is but four leagues didant from Bois le Duc, and a fine open country to ride over: they therefore harassed greatly the Brabanters near that part.

During the time these things were passing, the duke of Gueldres crossed the sea to England, to visit his cousin king Richard, and his other relatives the dukes of Lancaster, York and Glocester, who were then at home, and the great barons of England. They made him good cheer, for they were desirous to see and make acquaintance with him, having before heard how much the duke was attached to England. In this journey, he entered into alliance with the king of England; and, although he had not hitherto received any thing from the king to induce him to become his liege man, he now accepted a pension of one thousand marcs on the king of England's treasury, which, according to the value of the coin was equal to four thousand francs ready money*.

He was advised to renew his claims on Brabant, and was promised to be effectually assisted by England, that no loss should accrue to him. In return for which, he swore to be for ever loyal in his fervices to England: all this he too readily entered into. When this treaty had been concluded, he took leave of the king and his barons, and returned to Gueldres, when he told the duke of Juliers what he had done, and how he had strengthened himself by his alliance with England.

The duke of Juliers, who, from age, had more experience than his fon, was not much rejoiced on hearing it, and faid,—'William, what you have done may be the cause that both you and I shall dearly pay for your visit to England. Are you ignorant of the power of the duke of Burgundy, and that he has not his equal in this respect? He is the next heir to the duchy of Brabant, and how can you think of succeeding in any opposition to him, or of resisting so potent a prince?' 'How!' replied the duke of Gueldres, 'the more rich and powerful he is, the better to make war on. I had rather have for my enemy a rich man, who has large possessions, than a little baron from whom nothing can be gained: for one blow I receive, I wish to give fix;

* See the Fœdera, an. 10. Ricardi II. where the treaty is at length. The pention was for life, of one thousand pounds sterling.

fix; besides, the emperor of Germany is so much connected with England, that I may look for assistance from him should there be occasion.

'By my faith, fair fon William, you are mad; and more of your schemes will fall to the ground than will be accomplished.'

I will explain why the duke of Juliers thus checked his fon, and doubted of the fuccess of his enterprises. The late king of France exerted himfelf much to gain friends in different parts; and, though he could not prevail on many to join him in his wars, yet, by gifts and other compliments, he kept them quiet, and by fuch means acquired feveral friends in the empire and elsewhere. When the emperor had forgiven the duke of Juliers' conduct to the duke of Brabant, and the last, by obtaining his liberty, was reconciled to the duke of Juliers, he, at the defire of the king of France, waited on him at Paris, where he was most kindly received. The king gave to him and his knights very rich presents of jewels, to the great satisfaction of the duke. In this vifit the duke was prefented with Vierfon* and its lordships, which he held as a fief from the king, to whom he fwore he would never bear arms against France. Vierson was originally dependant on the counts de Blois, is fituated between Blois and Berry, and may be worth about five hundred francs a year.

During the reign of Charles V. he truly kept his oath, and, as long as this king lived, neither bore arms himself, nor entered into any treaty with the enemies of France. When Charles VI. began his reign, he was fo much embroiled with the wars with Flanders and England, that he could not attend to every thing. The duke of Juliers, not being fummoned, did not renew his homage for Vierfon; and the duke of Berry, noticing this, feized the lands, which he faid were dependant on him, and thus deprived the counts of Blois of their rights. This, however, caufed no quarrel between the families, for I faw them frequently together, and, indeed, from their connection it was right they should be good friends; for Lewis, son of the duke of Berry, was married to the lady Mary, daughter of the count de Blois.

* Vierfon,—a city of Berry, on the Cher, diocese of Bourges, twenty-two leagues from Orleans.

The duke of Juliers had thoughts of claiming the lands of Vierfon, until he found his fon had fo hastily, and, as he thought, imprudently allied himfelf with England, which he imagined would never turn out to his advantage. He had therefore spoken to him in the manner I have related, when the duke of Gueldres returned from England; but he paid not any attention to it, and, as he was young and rash, replied to his father, that he would not do otherwise than he had said; and that he preferred war to peace, and war against the king of France to a contest with a poorer person.

CHAP. XII.

THE DUCHESS OF BRABANT SENDS AMBASSADORS TO FRANCE FOR ASSISTANCE AGAINST THE DUKE OF GUELDRES.—THEY ARRIVE AT THE SAME TIME THE DUKE'S CHALLENGE IS BROUGHT, AND RECEIVE FAVOURABLE ANSWERS.

THE duchefs of Brabant, who refided at Bruffels, was well informed of every thing that was paffing, and that the duke of Gueldres menaced the Brabanters with war. She was fearful that he would put his threats in execution, and faid,—'Ah, may God graciously pardon my deceased lord; for, had he been alive, the duke of Gueldres would not have dared to use the expressions I hear he has done; but, because I am a woman, and old, he wants to attack and make war on me.'

The duchefs affembled her council on the occasion; for she knew her opponent was of a hasty temper, and that action would soon follow his words. At the time this council was held, the duke of Gueldres had sent his desiance to the king of France, which had caused great slander in all countries where it had been told; for the duke was but a petty prince in comparison with others; and the tenor of this challenge was, as I heard, written in fuch imperious and coarfe language as aftonished all who faw it.

This challenge was fpoken of variously, according as the different persons to whom it was told were attached.

The council of the duchefs, in answer to her when fhe demanded their advice, faid,- 'In the name of God, lady, what you ask may be speedily given. We advife, that you fend ambaffadors to the king of France and to the duke of Burgundy. You have a good opportunity; for the duke of Gueldres has fent his defiance to the king of France and all his allies. Should he carry his threats into execution, and, as it is reported, make war on that kingdom, in conjunction with the English and Germans, he cannot gain a more convenient entrance into it, than through your duchy. right, therefore, the king and the duke of Burgundy be prepared, and that all your castles on the frontiers be well supplied with men at arms; for there is no enemy fo contemptible, but that he should be feared. We do not mean to fay that against him alone, nor for what the Gueldrians may be able to do against us, we should seek for affistance or allies: oh, no; but on account of the connections he may have formed with foreign countries, especially with the English, in whose cause he is now arming, and the Germans, who are avaricious, and eager to make war on France for the wealth they hope to find there.'

The duchess replied, 'Your advice is good, and I will that attention be paid to it.' The envoys to

G 2 France

France were chosen from among the privy counfellors of Brabant, and were the lord de Bourgueval master of the household, sir John Opem, a most amiable knight, sir Nicholas de la Monnoye and John de Grave, a clerk. When their credential letters were drawn out and sealed, they lest Brussels and took the road to Paris. At this time, however, the king and the duke of Burgundy were at Rouen, whither the ambassadors went.

On their arrival at Rouen, they waited first on the duke of Burgundy, who entertained them handfomely, as he knew them well, and shewed him their credential letters. The duke having perused them, at the proper hour led them to the king, who received them graciously, from his regard to their duchess.

The king, after reading their papers, faid; 'What you request, demands consideration: keep near our fair uncle of Burgundy, and your business shall be attended to, and concluded as speedily as may be.' This answer was satisfactory to them, and, having taken leave of the king and the duke of Burgundy, they returned to their lodgings.

The king of France, his uncles and the lords of his council, had, at this moment, full employment, and were daily in council respecting different matters which required it. The challenge of the duke of Gueldres was not very agreeable; and they knew not the intentions of the duke of Brittany, from his strange conduct in regard to the constable of France. They had likewise heard he was busy in providing all his towns and castles with stores and men at arms; and that his correspondence was now more frequent than ever with the king of England and his two uncles: for the duke of Lancaster was still in Galicia. The council of France had, therefore, enough to do, to weigh well these matters; and were so much occupied on them, that the Brabanters waited some time for their answer.

At length, the duke of Burgundy gave it them as follows: 'You will return to our fair aunt, and falute her many times in my name. Give her these letters from the king and from me; and tell her, that we consider her affairs as our own, and desire her not to be alarmed at any thing, for she shall have speedy aid; and tell her that the country of Brabant shall not, in any way, be hurt or damaged.' This answer was very agreeable to the ambassadors, who instantly returned to Paris, and thence to Brussels, and gave the duchess a detailed account of what had passed, and of the answer they had received, so that she was persectly contented.

CHAP. XIII.

CONCERNING THE RUMOURS OF THE SIGNS OF SANCTITY WHICH WERE MANIFESTED BY THE CARDINAL DE LUXEMBOURG AFTER HIS DEATH.

THE EXTRAORDINARY END OF THE KING OF NAVARRE.

A BOUT this period, there were many rumours, that the body of Saint Peter de Luxembourg, who had been a cardinal, shewed miraculous powers in the city of Avignon. This holy cardinal was the fon of the lord Guy de Saint Paul, flain at the battle of Juliers. I must say, that the cardinal led a most holy and devout life, doing works agreeable to God; for he was courteous, modest, chaste and a great almfgiver. He kept from his church-preferments merely fufficient for his maintenance, and gave all the rest to the poor. He was the greater part of the day and night in prayer, and shunned all worldly vanities. His life was so devout that it pleafed God to call him in his youth; and, instantly after his death, his body, which he had ordered to be buried in the common sepulchre with the poor, performed miracles, for his whole life was full of humility, but it was interred in the chapel of St. Michael.

When the pope and cardinals perceived that miracles increased from this holy body, they sent an account of them to the king of France, and to the elder brother of the saint, count Waleran de St. Paul, inviting him to come to Avignon. The count could not refuse, and, when he went thinher, presented those fine silver lamps which are now before his altar. It was wonderful the great saith that was in this saint, and the numbers who came thither when I was at Avignon; for by that city I returned from Foix, to witness this. His miracles and votaries daily multiplied, and it was said he would be canonized; but I never heard more about it.

Since I have related the death of this holy cardinal, I will mention that of a different person, for I have not yet spoken of the death of a king who has supplied ample materials for many parts of this history. His actions, however, were the reverse from those of the preceding personage, for by them the realm of France was nearly destroyed. You will readily guess I mean the king of Navarre. truth well known, that nothing is more certain than death. I repeat it because the king of Navarre, when he died, did not think his end fo near. he fupposed it, he probably would have taken more care of himfelf. He refided in the city of Pampeluna, and took it into his head that he would raife two hundred thousand florins by a tax on his country. His council dared not contradict him, for he was a cruel man to all who did fo.

The principal inhabitants of the great towns were fummoned, and, fearful of difobeying, they came.

When all were affembled in the palace, the king himself, who was a subtle and eloquent man, explained to them the reasons why he wanted money; and that two hundred thousand florins must be raised from the country, in such wise that the rich should pay ten francs each, the middling ranks sive, and the poor one franc. This demand much astonished his audience; for the preceding year there had been a battle in Navarre, which had caused a tax to be laid for one hundred thousand florins: he had, beside, in the same year, married his daughter, the lady Jane, to the duke of Brittany, and there were large arrears of the tax for her dower yet unpaid.

The king having demanded their answer, they requested some time to consult together: he allowed them sisteen days, when they were all to meet again in the same place, that is to say, those who had come from the cities and towns; on which they departed. When news of this heavy tax was known, the whole country was in consternation. At the end of the fifteen days, they assembled again at Pampeluna, and the deputies from the principal towns amounted to about fixty persons. The king would hear their answer in person, and he ordered them to make it in a large orchard, which was distant from the palace and inclosed with high walls.

In giving their answer, they explained how impossible it was for the country to pay this new tax from the poverty of the kingdom, and from the arrears of former taxes being still unpaid. They were unanimous in this declaration, and begged of him, for God's fake, to have pity on them, for the country could not in truth bear any additional tax.

When the king of Navarre found he had not any hopes of fuccess, he was filent and discontented: on leaving them, he said, 'You have been badly advised: consult together again:' and then went away, followed by his council. The deputies were shut up in this orchard, with orders for no one to be suffered to go out of it, and very little meat or drink to be given them. They remained thus in great fear of their lives, and none dared open their lips. It may be supposed he succeeded at last in his plan; for he beheaded three of the most determined in their opposition, to frighten the others to his will.

At this moment an extraordinary event happened at Pampeluna, which feemed a judgment from God. I will relate it, as feveral perfons from Pampeluna told it me at Foix, which is but three days journey off.

It was reported, that the king of Navarre was fond of women, and had at this time a very handfome lady for his miftrefs, with whom he occasionally amused himself, for he had been long a widower. Having passed a night with her, he returned to his own chamber, shivering with cold, and said to one of his valets, 'Prepare my bed, for I want to lie down and repose myself a little.' When ready, he undressed himself and went to bed; but he was no sooner laid down than he began to shake, and could not get warm. He was of a great age, about fixty, and accustomed to have his bed well warmed with heated air to make him fweat; and this practice he had long continued without any visible harm. He ordered his fervants to warm the bed as usual; but this time, either by the will of God or the devil, it turned out very unfortunate, for the flames some how fet fire to the sheets, and it could not be extinguished before they were destroyed, and the king, who was wrapped up in them, horridly burnt as far as his navel. He did not inftantly die, but lingered on, in great pain and mifery, fifteen days; for neither furgeon nor phyfician could apply any remedies to prevent his death. Such was the end of the king of Navarre, which, however, freed his poor subjects from the tax he would have laid on them. His fon Charles was a young, handsome and gallant knight: he was acknowledged king of Navarre by all his fubjects, and, foon after the obsequies of his father, was crowned in the city of Pampeluna*.

CHAP.

* Charles king of Navarre died in 1387, aged 55 years. His death was worthy of his life. He was wrapped up in cloths that had been dipped in fpirit of wine and fulphur to re-animate the chill in his limbs, caused by his debaucheries, and to cure his leprofy. By some accident, they caught fire, as they were fewing them about him, and burnt the flesh off his bones. It is thus that almost all the french historians relate the death of Charles; but in the letter of the bishop of Dax, his principal minister, to queen Blanche, the sister of this prince, and widow of Philip de Valois, there is not one word said of this horrid accident, but only of the great pains he suffered in his last illness, and the resignation with which he bore them. Voltaire pretends that Charles was not worse than many other princes. Fereras

CHAP. XIV.

THE DUKE OF BERRY BESIEGES VENTADOUR *.

YOU have before read of the treaties the count d'Armagnac and the dauphin of Auvergne attempted to make with the captains of the free companies who held castles and forts in Auvergne, the Gevaudan, and Limousin, and were at war with their neighbours. Many of them were inclined to accept the terms offered, for they thought they had sufficiently plundered France, and wished to do the same elsewhere. The count d'Armagnac promised had faid before him, that the French firnamed him Charles the Bad, on account of the troubles he had fomented in the kingdom; but that, if his actions were examined, he would be found not fufficiently wicked to deferve fuch a firname. It is, however, precifely his actions that have caused it. He was, says father Daniel, treacherous, revengeful, cruel, and the sole cause of the ruin of France. Father Daniel speaks exactly like Mariana, who has painted with energy his cruelties, his infamous debaucheries and his treasons. Our best historians have done the same. But it is one of the sollies of our age to attempt the re-establishment of the most worthless characters, and to cry down those reputations that have been the most exalted.'

Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique.

For more of Charles de Navarre, see les Memoires de l'Académie.

* Ventadour,-a castle in the diocese of Limoges.

to lead them into Lombardy; but the count de Foix, whom it was not easy to deceive, imagined that was not his intention, and made fecret inquiries as to the progress of the business, and whither the men at arms were to march on quitting their strong The common report was, that they still continued their courses, for the men of the country fo related it to him. Upon hearing this, he shook his head, and faid,—'Such men at arms will not be trifled with. The count d'Armagnac and his brother Bernard are young, and I know they neither love me nor my country: these men at arms, therefore, may perchance fall on me, unless I shall take proper order to guard against them. The proverb fays, 'Long provision beforehand maketh fure poffession.'

The count de Foix was not, in truth, wrong in his conjectures, as appearances at one time shewed, which I shall relate, if I carry my history to that length.

You have heard how that Breton, Geoffry Têtenoir, had long held the castle of Ventadour, on the borders of Auvergne and the Bourbonois, and had refused to surrender for any money that had been offered him. He considered this castle as his own inheritance, and had forced all the surrounding country to enter into composition with him to avoid being plundered. By this means every one could labour the ground at their pleasure, and he was enabled to keep the state of a great baron. He was a cruel man, and very ferocious in his anger, minding no more killing a man than a beast. You must know, that when the tax for the redemption of these castles was first raised, those in Auvergne, imagining that Ventadour would be surrendered to the duke of Berry, and the country delivered from the oppressions of the garrison, very cheerfully paid their quota. But when they saw that of those garrisons who continued their inroads, that of Ventadour was the most daring, they were very disconsolate, and considered the tax that had been raised as thrown away. They declared, that until the garrison of Ventadour was prevented from overrunning the country, they would never pay one farthing of any future tax.

This was carried to the duke of Berry, who was lieutenant of Limousin, Gevaudan and Auvergne, and he declared to his council, that those who had made such declaration were in the right, and that the promises that had been held out were badly kept, by their not having so closely besieged the place, to prevent the garrison fallying forth.

The duke then ordered that four hundred spears should be collected, and paid by the country, and placed under the command of fir William de Lignac and fir John Bonne-lance, a courteous and valiant knight from the Bourbonois, for them to invest Ventadour completely on all sides with blockhouses.

These knights and men at arms laid their siege as closely as they could to the castle, and erected four block-houses: they also had large trenches cut by the peasants, and every obstruction thrown across across the roads they used to take, so that the garrifon was completely shut in. Geoffry, however, was indifferent to this; for he knew he had provision and stores to last for feven years, and that his castle was fo ftrongly placed upon a rock that it could not be taken by ftorm; and, notwithstanding these block-houses, and this supposed complete blockade, he, at times, with fome of his companions, made fallies through a postern that opened between two hidden rocks, and overran the country in fearch of wealthy prisoners. They never brought any thing beside with them to the castle, on account of the difficulty of the paffes. This opening could not be closed, and, to the surprise of the country, they were found abroad feven leagues distant: if they were by accident purfued, and had once regained their mountains, though the chace lasted for three leagues, they confidered themselves as secure as if in their fort. This manner of haraffing the country was long continued; and the fiege of the castle, in the manner I have related, lasted for more than a year: by it the country was faved the large fums they used to pay as composition-money. We will, for the present, leave Ventadour, and, by way of variety, speak of other matters.

CHAP. XV.

THE DUKE OF BURGUNDY SENDS FOUR HUNDRED SPEARS TO THE DUCHESS OF BRABANT.—THEY SURPRISE AND BURN THE TOWN OF SEAULLE IN GUELDRES.

THE duke of Burgundy was not forgetful of his promise to his aunt, the duches of Brabant. He assembled a body of four hundred good men at arms, from Burgundy and other parts, and appointed two knights for their commanders: the one was sir William de la Trimouille, a Burgundian; the other, sir Gervais de Merande, a German: and said to them,—'You will conduct these men at arms to that part of the frontiers of Brabant and Gueldres our fair aunt and her council have fixed on, and make a severe war on her enemy, for such are our commands.' The knights replied, they were ready and willing to obey his orders.

When all their stores and men were assembled, they set out for Brabant, and, having entered the duchy of Luxembourg, sent to inform the duchess of their coming. The marshal of Brabant went to meet and conduct them, and, by the directions of the council, quartered them in the three castles the duke of Gueldres claimed, of which they now formed formed the garrison, and, being on the enemy's land, went forth daily in hopes to meet them.

The duke of Gueldres, perceiving hostilities were begun, reinforced all his towns and castles, and made every preparation to withstand his opponents. Sir William de la Trimouille, desirous to gain renown, and to do fome act that should make it known he was in the country, cast his eyes on a town of Gueldres, about four leagues from the castle wherein he was, in hopes to gain it: it it was called Seaulle. Having fecretly opened his mind to fir Gervais de Merande, and explained his intentions, he agreed to accompany him; for he was equally anxious for deeds of arms. Having collected men from the different garrifons, they marched off at midnight, at a brifk trot, under the care of able guides, who brought them to Seaulle near the point of day. They then halted, and formed another disposition, which, as it was told me, was as follows: fir Gervais, with only thirty lances, was to leave the main body, and, if possible, to gain and keep the gate, until fir William should arrive with the remainder; for if the whole had advanced, an alarm might have been given, but fo few would possibly be taken for a party whom the duke of Gueldres had fent to reinforce the place, or fome of his men who were riding from one town to another.

As they had planned, fo was it executed: fir Gervais left the army with thirty german fpears, and rode towards the town. He passed indeed many people on his road thither; for it was market-day,

ket-day, and, as he passed, faluted them in German, which made them all suppose they were their countrymen, attached to the duke of Gueldres, and going to the garrison. Sir Gervais rode on until he came to the gate, which he found wide open and slightly guarded: indeed it was so early, that sew were out of bed. They there halted, and were scarcely masters of the gate, when sir William de la Trimouille, with the main body, came up full gallop, and entered the town, shouting their cry.

Thus was the town won without any defence being made: the garrifon never imagined the French would have been fo enterprifing, and the greater part were still in bed. It was on the Martinmas eve this deed was done. Three days before, an english knight had entered the town with ten fpears and thirty archers, whom the king of England had fent thither. The knight's name was fir William Fikaoul*; and, at the moment of the first noise and buftle, he was getting out of his bed. Hearing the town was taken, he asked by whom. He was told by Bretons. 'Ha!' faid he, 'Bretons are wicked fellows: they will pillage and burn the town, and then leave it: whose cry have they?" 'In the name of God,' replied a knight, 'they cry 'Trimouille!'

Sir William Fikaoul, upon this, armed himfelf, and made his men do the same, and barricade his house, to see if any would come to his rescue, but in vain; for every one was so frightened, they were flying in all directions, some for the church, others to escape by an opposite gate to that the enemy had entered, abandoning all they possessed.

* Fikaoul. Verard has Filzraoul, and my MS. Fitz-Paul. Lord Berners has the fame as in the text.

The French fet fire to the town to alarm others at a distance, but there were many houses of stone and brick which could not be affected by it: however, the greater part was burnt down and pillaged, for nothing worth taking was left; and they carried away some of the richest inhabitants prisoners.

The english knight was taken doing his duty. When he saw all was lost, he ordered his house to be cleared of the barricades; for he was fearful of fire, as his hall was full of sinoke, and, placing himself and men in front, fought very valiantly, but at length was made prisoner by fir William de la Trimouille: his men were likewise taken, for few were slain. When the French had done all they listed at Seaulle, in Gueldres, and their fervants had packed up the plunder, they departed, for it would have been folly to have remained longer, and marched to their different garrisons.

Such was the fuccess of this first blow the duke of Gueldres received: he was much vexed when he heard of his loss, and hastened thither with a large body of men at arms, hoping to find the French still there. He strengthened and repaired the town, and placed therein a garrison, who were more diligent in guarding it than the preceding one had been. Thus it happens in war; sometimes one side loses, and sometimes another.

The duchess of Brabant was highly pleased with the success of fir William de la Trimouille and sir Gervais de Merande, and they acquired much renown for it throughout the country. It was the common talk in Brabant, that in the course of the ensuing summer, they would renew the attack, and keep possession of it, for they should then have a sufficient force.

The duke of Burgundy was well pleased to hear such fatisfactory accounts of the good conduct of those he had sent to Brabant; and, to encourage them to persevere, he frequently wrote to his knight fir William de la Trimouille. They guarded so well the castles on the frontier, that no loss happened; and the enemy was more careful in regard to their towns than they had been before the capture of Seaulle.

I will now relate an exploit of Perrot le Béarnois in Auvergne, and detail the whole history of it at length.

CHAP. XVI.

GERONNET DE MAUDURANT, ONE OF THE CAPTAINS OF PERROT LE BEARNOIS, HAVING BEEN MADE PRISONER BY JOHN BONNE-LANCE, AT MONTFERRANT IN AUVERGNE, FINDS MEANS, AFTER HIS RANSOM WAS PAID, TO PUT LE BEARNOIS IN POSSESSION OF MONTFERRANT.

THIS fame year, about the middle of May, forty bold companions fet out from Chaluçet*, in the possession of Perrot le Béarnois, in Limousin, to feek adventures in Auvergne, under the command of a squire from Gascony called Geronnet de Maudurant, an able man at arms. On account of the dread this country and the borders of the Bourbonois had of these people, the duke of Bourbon had appointed, for its defence, one of his knights, a valiant man at arms, called fir John Bonne-lance, who was courteous, amorous and cager to display his courage. When he heard these companions were abroad, he asked how many they might be: and when they faid, 'About forty,' he replied, 'As for forty lances, we do not fear that number: I will take as many to meet them.'

He then departed from the place where he had heard of this excursion, but his greater force was before Ventadour, and collected about forty or fifty of his men at arms that were dispersed on the borders of Limousin, Auvergne and the Bourbonois, for he was very desirous to perform some deed of arms. He had with him sir Lewis d'Ambiere, sir Lewis d'Abton and the lord de St. Obise. They took the field without following any particular road, for they were well acquainted with the country, and came to a pass through which they imagined the enemy must cross, and no where else, on account of the mountains, and a river which is wide and deep from the melting of the snow.

* Chaluçet,-election of Limoges, near Pierre-buffiere.

They had not been there half an hour when the enemy appeared, no way fuspecting this meeting. Bonne-lance and his party, with their spears in their rests, charged them, shouting their cry as they were descending the mountain on foot. When they found they must fight, they put a good countenance on it, and prepared for their defence: Geronnet, who was a flout fquire, fet them the example. Many were, at the first onset, beat down on both fides; but, to fay the truth, the French were by far better men at arms than these adventurers, which they shewed, for not one turned his back but the fervants, who by flight faved themselves while their masters were fighting. Two and twenty were made prisoners, and fixteen left dead on the field: their leader furrendered himfelf prisoner to Bonne-lance.

The victorious party set out on their return, carrying their prisoners with them. On the road,

Bonne-

Bonne-lance recollected that, about a month ago, when at Montferrant in Auvergne, he had been well received by the ladies and damfels, and that, as they were amufing themselves, they said to him, Fair brother Bonne-lance, you are often in the field, and must at times meet your enemies.' A lady, who was much in his good graces, added,-I am fure you have frequent engagements with them, and I fay fo because I should like to see an Englishman. I have often heard, from a squire of this country with whom you are well acquainted, of the name of Gourdines, that they are determined men at arms, and as expert as any in this country. Indeed, they prove it by their gallantry, and by taking from us towns and castles, and keeping possession of them.' 'By God, fair lady,' replied Bonne-lance, 'if I have the good fortune to make one of them my prisoner, you shall see him. ' Many thanks,' answered the lady.

When Bonne-lance remembered this, he had taken the road to Clermont in Auvergne, as the engagement had been hard by; but he quitted it, and followed that to Montferrant, which lay about one league off on the left hand.

The inhabitants of Montferrant were in high fpirits at the fuccess of Bonne-lance over these adventurers, and gave him a hearty welcome.

When he and his people had difmounted at the hôtel, they difarmed and took their ease. The ladies and damsels assembled to entertain and feast Bonne-lance, whom they came twenty times to see. He gallantly received them, for he was a prudent knight, knight, and addreffing himself to the lady who was so anxious to see an Englishman, said,—'Lady, I am come to acquit myself of the promise I made you about a month ago, that if I should, by good fortune, take an Englishman prisoner, I would shew him to you. Through the grace of God, I have this day fallen in with a party of very valiant ones; but, although they gave us enough to do, the field is ours. They were not indeed real Englishmen, but Gascons who wage war under that name, and come from Béarn and upper Gascony. You may view them at your leisure; for, out of my love to you, I shall leave them in this town until they have paid me their ransom.'

The ladies laughed, turned the matter into merriment, and faid, they were obliged to him. When they departed, he accompanied them, and remained in Montferrant for three days amufing himfelf with the ladies and damfels. Bonne-lance, during his ftay, gave good entertainment to Maudurant and his companions, as he faw they were poor, but bold fellows in the field: it would have been better for the town had he killed or drowned them than to have left them there.

When he was going away, he faid to Geronnet, You will remain here as hoftage for your companions, who are to feek your ranfom; and, when you shall be prepared to pay, I have ordered a perfon to receive it for me; and, the moment you have acquitted yourself to me, you may depart, for I have left instructions that you may meet with no impediment. Remember, Geronnet, that I have treated treated you handsomely; and, if any of our men fall into your hands, do you treat them in like manner.' 'On my faith,' replied Geronnet, 'my fair lord and master, that I will cheerfully do, for we are bounden to it by your generous conduct.'

Bonne-lance returned to the fiege of Ventadour, and twelve of his prisoners remained in Montserrant. The ten others, according to agreement, returned to Chaluçet, to seek, from Perrot le Béarnois, two-and-twenty hundred francs; for this was the sum their ransoms had been fixed at. The twelve in Montserrant were lodged in a handsome house, and lived at much expense. They were not strictly watched; and, during the fisteen days they staid, they went about the town to amuse themselves, and made such observations on the state of it as cost it afterwards one hundred thousand francs.

When the captain of Chaluçet heard of the ill fuccess of Geronnet de Maudurant, and that he and his companions had been defeated by fir John Bonne-lance, he was very indifferent about it, and replied to those who had brought him the news,— 'You are come hither to seek for money to pay his and your ransoms: are you not?' 'Yes,' they replied, 'for gain is not always to be looked for.' I know nothing of gain or loss,' answered the captain; 'but this I know, you will get nothing from me. I did not send you on this excursion: it was your own free election to seek an adventure. Send to, or tell your companions when you see them, that adventure must deliver them. Do you suppose fuppose that I will thus spend my money? No, my friends, that I will not, by my faith. I can always have men enough, who will make more prudent excursions than ye have done. I will not, therefore, ransom any man belonging to me, unless he be taken when in my company.' This was all the answer they could get respecting Geronnet's ransom.

They confulted together, and thought it would be right to fend three of them to give Geronnet information of this, that he might confider the matter. The three who were fent, passing without the walls of Clermont, gave their horses water at the mill brook, which runs hard by. They remained fome time in the brook observing the walls of Clermont, and noticing they were not too high to be scaled. 'By the head of Saint Anthony,' faid they among themselves, 'this town may be eafily taken: if we come here fome night, we may have it, provided the guard is not very strong. They then added, in their gafcon dialect, 'We will bargain for it now, and another time buy it: one cannot bargain and buy in the fame day.' They then passed on, and arrived at Montferrant, where they found Geronnet and their companions. They related to them, word for word, all that had passed between them and Perrot le Béarnois, which, as they knew not where elfe to feek for money to pay their ranfoms, vexed them exceedingly, and for a day and night they were outrageous at his conduct.

Geronnet having calmly confidered the matter,

faid to those who had come from Chaluçet,—
'Brother-foldiers return to our captain, and tell him from me, that ever since I have been under his command, I have loyally and faithfully served him, and, if he pleases, will continue to do so; and let him know, that if I shall be forced to turn to the French to obtain my liberty, he will not gain by it. I shall, however, delay doing this as long as I can; and it will be always against my own inclinations. Tell him also, that if he will pay our ransoms, I will, within one month after our deliverance, conduct him to such a place, that it will be his own fault, if he does not gain one hundred thousand frances from it.'

The three companions returned to Perrot, and punctually gave him the message that Geronnet had charged them with. On hearing it, he mused a while, and said, 'It may be so: I will speedily give him his liberty.' He ordered a large coster to be opened, that contained upwards of forty thousand francs, money acquired by pillage you must understand, and not from the rents of his estate in Béarn; for the town wherein he was born, and always resided before he lest Béarn, has but twelve houses, and belongs to the count de Foix. The name of it is Dadam, three leagues from Orthès.

Perrot le Béarnois had counted out before him two-and-twenty hundred francs, and one hundred for their expenses, which he put into a purse, and, calling to him the three companions who had returned from Montserrant, said,—'I give you threeand-twenty hundred francs: a friend in need is a friend indeed: I shall risk them for Geronnet's freedom: he is able to regain for me, if he pleases, as much again, if not more.'

The companions took the money and fet out again for Montferrant, which was fourteen long leagues distant; but they had very good passports, which permitted them to pass and repass. Geronnet, on learning that they had returned with the money, was much pleafed: he fent for those to whom fir John Bonne-lance had directed him to pay it, and faid to them, - 'Count it: you will find the purfe contains two thousand two hundred francs, which is all we are to give you.' After this, he paid liberally, and to the fatisfaction of all, the expenses they had been at. When this was done, Geronnet borrowed and hired horses and men to conduct them to Chaluget, fir John Bonnelance having received a certificate of the ranfom being paid.

I am ignorant whether fir John Bonne-lance fent for this money or left it in Montferrant, trusting to the strength of the place; for fir Peter de Giac, at that time chancellor of France, had there deposited his wealth, of which he lost the whole, or at least as much as could be discovered, according to what you will hear told.

When Geronnet de Maudurant returned to Chaluçet, his companions gladly received him, and made him good cheer. After three or four days, Perrot le Béarnois called him and faid,—' Geronnet, you are obliged to the fair offers you fent me, for your freedom, and to them alone; for you know, know, I was not any way bound to pay your ranfom, when taken in excursions made without my orders: now, keep your word, and prove the truth of your offer; otherwise we shall be on bad terms, and you will incur my serious anger; for know that I have not learnt to lose, but to win.'

'Captain,' replied Geronnet, 'you have reason to say so; and I now offer to put you in possession of Montserrant within sisteen days, if you be willing to undertake it. In this town there is great wealth and wherewithal to plunder; for, besides its riches in silk and merchandise, many of the inhabitants have much money. Sir Peter de Giac, chancellor of France, who knows well where to seek for money, has deposited, as I have been informed, a very large sum in this town of Montserrant; and I must say, it is the weakest and worst guarded town in the realm: this is the offer I sent you, and the promise I entered into.'

'In God's name,' answered Perrot, 'it is well faid, and I accept it: I will secretly make preparations: you know all the outlets of the town: but will it require many men?' 'Three or four hundred spears,' said Geronnet, 'will do the business; for they do not seem people likely to make any great resistance.' 'Well, by God,' replied Perrot, 'I will undertake it, and make it known to the captains of the forts that are near us, and when we be all assembled, will march thither.'

In consequence, Perrot le Béarnois got himself in readiness, and sent information of his intentions to the captains of the forts in the neighbourhood, and fixed their rendezvous at the castle of Donzac*, in the bishoprick of Clermont, that was not far distant from Montferrant: Olim Barbe, a Gascon, and famous pillager, was the captain of it. The companions from feven forts attached to the English met, on the appointed day, at Donzac, and were upwards of four hundred lances, well mounted, whence they had only fix leagues to ride to Montferrant. The first captain who arrived was Perrot le Béarnois, to shew he was the chief of the expedition, and to confult with the other leaders before the whole came thither, and lay their plans according to the information which had been given by Geronnet de Maudurant, and as to the time he had fixed for their coming to the town.

Geronnet, with eleven companions, dreffed themselves in coats of frise, like to traders, and each leading a horse well laden, according to the custom of the country, set out from Donzac before day, conducting their horses on the road, as carriers: they arrived about noon in the town of Montserrant. No one made any inquiries who they were, never suspecting them to be otherwise than traders or carriers, as their dresses shewed, and supposing that they were come to purchase draperies and linens at the fair; for they had travelled, they said, from beyond Montpelier for this purpose; and already much merchandise had arrived from the neighbouring towns.

* Donzac, a village in Armagnac, diocese and generality of Auch.

Geronnet carried his company to the Crown Inn, where, having put their horses in a stable, they chose a handsome apartment for themselves, where they remained in quiet, not venturing abroad, in the town, lest their plan might be discovered, but thought only of enjoying themselves, as they intended others should pay their reckoning.

Towards evening, they took a great deal of care of their horses, and gave the host, hostess, and servants to understand, as they had come afar off, it was necessary they should be well attended to. They called so loudly for candles, they could not satisfy them; and would not go to bed, but kept drinking and roaring in their chamber. The host and hostess, noticing the merry life they led, and not having the smallest suspicions of them, went to bed.

I will now return to Perrot le Béarnois and his companions. This fame day, towards evening, they left Donzac, under the command of feven captains. Perrot le Béarnois was the chief, then the bourg de Copane, whose name was Arnaudon, the bourg Anglois, le bourg Carlat, Apton Seighin, Olim Barbe, and Bernadon des Isles: there was also with them a grand pillager from Béarn, called the lord de Lance-plaine. It was from him and the bourg de Copane I learnt all this business, and the manner of its being undertaken, after Candlemas, when the nights are long and cold. The weather this night was fo fevere, with wind and rain, that the captain of the guard would not leave his house, but sent his son, a boy about sixteen years old, to examine the state of the guard. On his arrival, between the outward and inward gate, he found four old men, almost frozen with cold, who said to him, 'Take from each of us a halfpenny, and allow us to go and warm ourselves.' The youth was eager for the money, which he took, and suffered the guard to go home.

Geronnet or some of his people were constantly on the watch at the gate of the Crown, for the relief of the guard. Observing the youth return, and the guard with him, they said,—'Things go well: it will be a good night for us: there are none in the town but those who are now in bed, and, as the guard is dismissed, we have nothing to fear.'

Perrot and his companions were making all the haste they could; but they were obliged to pass under the walls of Clermont. When within one league of that place, they met Amerigot Marcel, governor of Alose, near St. Flour, with about one hundred spears. When they were known to each other, there was much joy; and they mutually asked whither they were going in such bad weather, and what were the objects of their being abroad. Amerigot Marcel faid,— I come from my castle of Alose, and am going to Carlat.' God's name,' replied the two captains of Carlat, the bourg Anglois and the bourg de Copane, here we are, if you have any thing to fay to us. Do you want any thing?' 'Yes,' faid he: 'you have have fome prisoners who belong to the dauphin d'Auvergne, and you know he is in treaty with us through the Count d'Armagnac. I wish, therefore, to have those prisoners in exchange for some others who are in my fort, as I have been earnestly requested to get them by the lady-dauphin, and she is so good a lady, one cannot resuse her any thing.'

The bourg de Copane replied, - 'Amerigot, you are indeed bounden to oblige this lady, for you had from her, three years ago, five thousand francs of her money for the ranfom of the castle of Mercier. Where is now the lord dauphin?' 'They tell me,' fays Amerigot, 'that he is at Paris, negotiating the treaties you know we have engaged in with him and the count d'Armagnac.' Come with us, faid Perrot le Béarnois, and leave all these things: you will gain by it, for you shall have a share of our booty.' 'Whither are you going?' asked Amerigot. 'By my faith, brother-foldier, we are going straight to Montferrant, as that town is to be delivered to me this night.' Amerigot replied,- Perrot, what you are about is very wrong; for you know we have entered into a treaty with the count d'Armagnac and this country, which, on that account, thinks itself in a perfect state of security. You will act indeed very ill, if you execute what you have faid, and by it break off all our treaties.' 'On my troth, companion, I will never keep any treaty, faid Perrot, 'as long as I am master of the field, for we must live. Come with us, for you have nothing nothing to do at Carlat, as the captains are here, and those they have left behind will never give you admittance into the fort.'

'With you,' replied Amerigot, 'I will not go, but, fince things are thus, return to my own castle." The parties then feparated, and Perrot continued his road toward Clermont and Montferrant. When they were below Clermont, they fuddenly halted, for a new thought had struck some of them from what the Gafcons told who had been backwards and forwards to Chalucet from Montferrant. They faid to the captains who were collected together,-'This city of Clermont is large and rich, and as eafy to be taken as Montferrant: fince we have ladders with us, let us fcale the walls: we shall gain more than at Montferrant.'-On hearing this, they had almost resolved to put it into execution; but their captains, having confidered it, faid,-'Clermont is a strong town, populous, and well provided with arms: if once we alarm them, they will collect together and defend themselves. There is not a doubt of our having the worst of it; and if we be repulfed, and our horses taken or lost, we shall be disabled from advancing any farther. We are at a distance from our castles: the country will rife against us: we shall be pursued, and run the greatest hazard of loss of life or liberty. It will be more adviseable to continue our road, and finish what had been first fixed on, than to attempt any new exploit that may cost us too dear.'

This advice was followed, and not one word more faid on the fubject. They passed Clermont Vol. IX, as quietly and quickly as they could, and, on the point of eleven o'clock, came before Montferrant. They fuddenly halted, when they perceived the town about two bow-shots off, and Perrot said,— 'We are now at Monsferrant: our people must be within it. Do you wait here, and I will go by these ditches to see if I can learn any thing of Geronnet, who has brought us hither; and do not you stir until I return.' 'Go,' replied his companions: 'we will wait for you.'

On this, Perrot le Béarnois, with three others, went away; but it was fo very dark, they could not see the length of an acre, and it rained, snowed and blew most unmercifully. Geronnet was at this hour on the walls, impatiently liftening to hear of the arrival of his friends. He looked down, and faw, as he thought, the shadows of men entering the ditches: on this, he began to whiftle. He was heard by Perrot, who advanced more into the ditch, for there was no water in it on that fide; and Geronnet asked, 'Who is there?' Perrot knew him from his gascon pronunciation, and said, 6 I am Perrot le Béarnois: is it thou, Geronnet? 'Yes,' replied he: 'if you will make yourself ready, and advance your men, you shall enter the town at this place: we cannot fail of success, for the inhabitants are all in bed.' 'At this place!' faid Perrot, 'God forbid: I will never enter that way; and, if I do at all, it shall be through the gate.' 'Then you will not enter at all,' replied Geronnet, in a passion. On my troth, Perrot, it is not in my power: come hither with your roperope-ladders, and none will attempt to oppose your entrance.' 'Listen to me, Geronnet,' said Perrot: 'thou hast promised to give me entrance into this town; and, according to thy engagement, I will enter it no other way than by the gate.' 'I cannot help it,' said Geronnet, 'for it is impossible to enter by the gate, as it is closed and guarded, although the men may be asseed.'

While they were thus difputing, fome of Perrot's men came near the ditch to hear if any body were stirring. Near to where they were, was a fmall infulated house, adjoining the walls, in which lived a poor taylor, who, having been hard at work until that hour, was going to bed. As the wind carried the founds of their voices, and as perfons hear better in the night than in the daytime, he fancied he heard fome loud talking on the bulwarks. He left his house, and, advancing on the walls, faw Perrot's men walking about; on which he cried out, 'Treason!' when one of Geronnet's companions, feizing him by the throat, faid, 'If thou utterest another word, thou art a dead man.' On this, fearing to be murdered, he was filent, and Geronnet, turning towards them, faid,- Do not kill the fellow, for he comes fo opportunely, it must be through the mercy of God that he is fent, fince by his means we fhall completely fucceed in our enterprife.' Then, addreffing himself to Perrot, he added,- Do you return to your men; and, when you shall hear the inner gate open, do you attack the outward one with axes to gain admittance.' He then told him the use he meant to make of the taylor. Perrot went to his men, and related to them all you have heard. When he was gone, Geronnet faid to the taylor, ' If thou dost not promise to do all I shall order thee, thou art inftantly a dead man.' 'And what do you want me to do?' I want thee to go with me to the gate of the town, and awaken the porters, and tell them the governor has fent thee thither to order them to open the gates, or to let thee open them, to fome merchants from Montpelier, who are without, heavily laden with merchandife for the fair.' 'I do not think they will believe me,' faid the man. 'Yes, they will, if thou tell them, as a token of being fent by the governor, that he could not come himfelf to relieve the guard, but fent his fon in his flead. If thou dost not well perform all I have now told thee, or flould we fail in our exploit, I will flay thee with this dagger.'

1 2

The poor man, feeing himself menaced with death, for the Gascons are ready enough at this business, promised to do every thing according to the orders given to the utmost of his power. They went to the gate, and, after knocking at it for some time, awakened the porters: they asked,—'Who are ye that awaken us at such an hour?' I am such a one,' naming himself, 'who have this night carried home some work to the governor's house; and, as I was coming away, news was brought that some merchants from Montpelier were without the gate, quite jaded and wet with their journey and loads. He has therefore fent me to tell you to open the gates, or to give me the keys to do fo; and, as a proof I am fent by him, I was to fay he did not relieve the guard this evening, but fent his fon.' 'That is true,' replied they: 'thou fhalt have the keys: only wait a moment.'

One of them arose, and taking the keys, that were hanging on a peg, opened a small window, and gave them to him. The moment after, Geronnet snatched them from him, and went to the bars of the gate. The first key he put into the lock luckily opened it: and he then went to the outward gate, thinking to do the same there, but in vain.

Perrot and his companions were on the outfide, waiting its opening; but, as Geronnet's endeavours were fruitlefs, he faid to them, 'My fair firs, give fome affiftance; for I cannot any way open this gate.' Then those who were provided with axes and wedges, began to use them like carpenters. As soon as they had made a hole, Geronnet gave them hatchets and saws to cut the bars. Several of the inhabitants, on hearing the noise, quitted their beds, wondering what it could be; for they never imagined the English were come to awaken them at such an hour.

The porters at the gate, who had so badly guarded it, hearing the clattering of armour and the neighing of horses, knew they had been deceived and surprised. They went to the windows over the gate, and bawled out, 'Treason! treason!' which alarmed the whole town: many rose and fled to fave themselves and fortune in the castle, but few were allowed to enter it; for, when the governor heard the English had surprised the town, for fear of consequences, he would not lower the draw-bridge. He received, indeed, some of his friends at the first moment, by means of a plank; but, when he heard the cries of the women and children, he withdrew the plank, and would never replace it, but made his preparations for defence, in case the castle should be attacked.

I have faid how the first gate was opened: the fecond was cut down with axes, and the captains, with their companions, marched into the town without any opposition. They did not, as first, enter a house, for they knew not if any bodies of men were collecting to refift them, but went through the town to be affured of it. They only found a few, who were attempting to enter the caftle, that made any refistance, but they were foon either flain or made prifoners. Why should I make a long story of it? The town of Montferrant was thus furprifed, on a Thursday night, the thirteenth day of February, by Perrot le Béarnois and his accomplices. When they faw themselves masters of the place, they took up their lodgings at different hôtels, without doing violence to any one; for Perrot had ordered, under pain of death, that neither woman nor damfel should be violated, that no houses should be burnt, nor any prisoners made without his knowledge; and that no one, under the fame penalty, should hurt church or churchman, nor take away any thing from thence. These were the orders Perrot le Béarnois always gave; and he had made them be strictly observed ever since he had entered France, to carry on a war against its towns and castles.

Such was not the conduct of Geoffry Tête-noir: it was indifferent to him whether churches were plundered or not, fo that he gained by it. When news was brought to Clermont, which is but a fhort league distant, of the capture of Montferrant by the English, the inhabitants were greatly alarmed, and not without cause, for their enemies were too near. They knew not well how to act; but they made preparations for the defence of the town. This intelligence was also carried to Château-neuf, on the Allier, Thionne, Vic, Yssoire, Rioms, Aigue-perfe, and the strong castle of Montpenfier: all, or the greater part, of these places belonged to the duke of Berry. Those who heard it, or were any way affected by it, were exceedingly furprifed: and the neighbouring parts of Auvergne, Bourbonois, Forêts, and even as far as Berry, trembled. When the news came to Paris, the king and his uncles were, as was natural, very wroth.

The count-dauphin of Auvergne was at this time in Paris, on the affairs of his country, and greatly hurt when told of the furprife of Montferrant; for, as he was with the count d'Armagnac, lieutenant for the king over these countries, he was afraid blame would be imputed to him for being absent from his government. But his excuse was, that he was at Paris for the completion of the treaties that had been entered into with the captains of the free companies, and that, on the faith of them, the country had thought itself in perfect fecurity. The dauphin, however, set out from Paris, for Auvergne, the moment he heard of it, leaving his state behind, and, only attended by one page, took the road for Moulins, in the Bourbonois, changing horses daily. In this haste, he came to St. Pierre le Moustier*, where he learnt other intelligence, which I will relate to you.

CHAP. XVII.

PERROT LE BEARNOIS AND HIS COMPANIONS DE-TERMINE NOT TO KEEP POSSESSION OF MONT-FERRANT.—THEY MAKE A SALLY ON SOME TROOPS FROM CLERMONT, WHO HAD ADVANCED TO THE BARRIERS OF THE CAPTURED TOWN, AND INSTANTLY DEFEAT THEM.

ON the Friday morning these captains, being complete lords of Montserrant, and having had all the inhabitants tied together, so that they could not any way oppose them, searched their houses, and packed up whatever they thought would be profitable to them, in draperies, cloths, furs, dreffes, and other articles. When at breakfast, they had a long consultation, whether to keep the town or not: some were for keeping and fortifying it; but the majority were of a contrary opinion, and said it would be madness to do so, for they would be at too great a distance from their own castles, and be inclosed within it. Should they be besieged, they were not in force to hold out, and too far from any assistance.

* St. Pierre le Moustier, a town in the Nivernois, seven leagues from Moulins.

They would be starved into a surrender; for there were numbers of gentlemen in the towns and cities about; and the duke of Berry, as soon as he should hear what they had done, would order thusher the Marshal of France, the lord Lewis de Sancerre. The count d'Armagnac and the dauphin would advance to the siege with a great force, without waiting to be sent to; for they had under them the following great barons: the lords de la Tour, d'Apton, d'Aptiel, de Renel, de la l'alisse, and several more; but, above all, fir John Bonnelance would come hither, with a large body of friends; for it had been said the town was lost by his imprudence and neglect.

Such were the arguments urged against keeping the town, particularly by Perrot le Béarnois and Olim Barbe. Many other reasons were added; for, should they be taken, they would lose all they had, be punished for what they had done, and their forts would be taken from them. They therefore resolved to march away that evening, and carry away their booty and prisoners, of whom they had more than two hundred. To prevent any hindrance to this plan, they posted strong guards at all the gates, so that no one could leave the town.

I will now relate a skirmish that passed between them and fome from Clermont. When news first came to Clermont that Montferrant was taken by the English, they were much alarmed at having fuch neighbours, and held many confultations on the fubject. There was, on the road from Clermont to Montferrant, the handsomest, strongest, and best built church, belonging to the mendicant friars, in France: It had large inclosures, furrounded by high walls, within which were very productive vineyards; for, one year with another, these friars made from one hundred to fix score hogsheads of wine. In these consultations, some advifed the destruction of this monaster;; as they faid it was fo near the town, that it was not unlikely to be its ruin, if in the hands of these pillagers. The pulling it down had been in agitation formerly, and they were now eager to effect it. But others faid, it would be a pity to destroy fuch handsome buildings; and that it would be better to march to Montferrant, and skirmish with the conquerors, at the barriers, and, if possible, invest the place, to prevent the enemy leaving it; for, within four days, the knights and fquires of the Bourbonois and Forêts would be collected and lay fiege to it. While these conversations were going forward in the city of Clermont, about fixty men at arms, well mounted, were ready to march towards Montferrant, and skirmish at the barriers, and then return home again. No one checked their ardour; for there were among them fome of the nobleft in the town, who feemed eager to perform deeds of valour. Being all equipped, they fet off for Montferrant, taking with them thirty cross-bows. Upwards of two hundred volunteers left Clermont and followed them on foot.

It was told to the companions in Montferrant, that a party from Clermont were at the barriers. This news pleafed them much: upwards of one hundred of the most expert having armed themfelves, and mounted their horfes, ordered the gates to be thrown open, and fell upon those from Clermont, fhouting, 'Saint George!' When the party faw themselves thus v gorously attacked, they were panic-struck and instantly defeated, without making the smallest defence, but flying in all directions. The best mounted, on leaving Clermont, took the lead, and faid on the road, they would be the first to attack these pillagers; but shortly they were the first to return to their town, and the Gafcons at their heels. Had the last had as good horses, all or the greater part would have remained with them: they, however, chaced them until they met the volunteers on foot, who, when they perceived the defeat of their townsinen, kept no longer any order, but ran away for the fastest, leaping from hedge to hedge, and from ditch to ditch, to fave themselves. The cross-bows from Clermont kept in better array when the others fled, and drew themselves up in a vineyard with presented bows, making making a shew of defence. They there remained until the English had returned to Montserrant, for they never thought of going after them. The Clermentois lost twenty of their men, six killed and fourteen made prisoners.

CHAP. XVIII.

PERROT LE BEARNOIS AND HIS COMPANIONS, HAVING PLUNDERED MONTFERRANT, RETREAT TO THEIR FORTS.—HIS ANSWER TO THE DAUPHIN OF AUVERGNE, WHO COMPLAINS OF HIS HAVING SURPRISED THIS TOWN DURING THE TIME TREATIES WERE IN AGITATION FOR HIS LEAVING THE COUNTRY.

fily employed until near night in packing up their plunder. On the point of fix o'clock, having completed it, they were on foot, except about fixty on horseback, and conducted down the streets more than four hundred horses laden with cloths, linen, furs, and whatever they had seized. They had found, in the houses of the rich, caskets full, but had left them empty. Having bound all the inhabitants, two and two, they had the gates opened after nightfal and departed, not having staid at Montferrant more than eighteen hours. They fent their their baggage and prisoners before, with those on foot; and the captains followed close after on horseback.

It was dark night; and, as the country did not fuspect their stay would have been so short, they were not pursued. About midnight they came to Donzac, which they had left two days before, and there unpacked and examined their plunder. I heard, when in that country, that they gained by this expedition upwards of one hundred thousand francs, besides prisoners; for sir Peter de Giac, chancellor of France, alone lost more than thirty thousand francs in gold.

The companions had wifely refolved to leave Montferrant as they did: had they flaid two days longer, they could not have attempted it without great danger of their lives. The whole furrounding country were collecting, and advancing in great bodies to lay fiege to them, under the command of the lords de la Tour, de Montague, d'Apthier, d'Apthon, fir Guiscard Dauphin, the marquis of Gaiulhat, fir Lewis d'Ambiere, the lord de la Palisse, fir Ploustrac de Chastelux, and the sénéschal de Montaigne. None remained at home, and the count-dauphin was very active in the matter. would have been there within two days, had he not heard that the Gascons had retreated to their forts: at the fame time, he received an account of all the mischief which they had committed.

When he was affured this intelligence was true, he travelled more flowly to Saint Pourçain, and thence to Moulins in the Bourbonois, where he met his daughter, the duchefs of Bourbon, who had been very much alarmed, but was rejoiced on hearing the enemy had retreated, though those of Montferrant had suffered severely by their visit, as her country was now freed from such near and troublesome neighbours.

'On my faith,' faid the count-dauphin, 'though it were to cost me a very large sum of money, I wish these pillagers had remained in Montserrant, for it should have ended badly with them. We in Auvergne could never have had so fair an opportunity of punishing them, and gaining their forts. They prove their abilities in war by having so expeditiously sinished the matter. They have now reentered their forts, and their plunder is in safety.' Thus did the count-dauphin of Auvergne and his daughter, the duchess of Bourbon, converse together.

Perrot le Béarnois, Olim Barbe, le bourg de Copane, le bourg Anglois, Apthon Seighin, and the other captains of the free companies, on their arrival at Donzac, made a division of their pillage and prisoners: some they ransomed, others were carried with them to their different forts, when they separated at Donzac for Carlat, Chaluçet, and their other garrisons.

The country of Auvergne was now better guarded than ever. The count d'Armagnac and the count-dauphin fent, however, to tell Perrot le Béarnois, that he had treacherously and wickedly surprised and plundered Montserrant, during the time when treaties were negotiating between them, and that, as he had affented to fuch treaties, they expected he would make reparation for the mischief that had been done. Perrot replied to this message by saying, that 'under their graces' favour, neither he nor any of the seven captains, who had plundered Montserrant, had ever entered into any treaty with them: that they had not taken the town treacherously nor by scalado, but had fairly entered by the gate, which had been opened to them on their arrival: that if they had assented to a treaty, legally sworn and sealed, they would, on their part, religiously and loyally have adhered to it; but that was not the fact, nor had they intentions of ever entering into any treaty with them.'

Things remained in this state, nor could these lords gain any thing more. Sir Peter de Giac was much vexed at his loss, and the townsmen of Montferrant recovered themselves as well as they could from such an unfortunate adventure.

CHAP. XIX.

THE LORD LEWIS OF BLOIS MARRIES THE LADY MARY OF BERRY, AND THE LORD JOHN OF BERRY THE PRINCESS MARY OF FRANCE, WHO DIES SHORTLY AFTER.—THE DEATH OF THE LADY JANE OF ARMAGNAC, DUCHESS OF BERRY.

COUNT Guy de Blois, in company with his countess and a handsome attendance of knights, squires and ladies, set out, in the month of August of the year of our Lord 1386*, in grand array, from his castle of Blois, for Berry. They carried with them their young son, who, the preceding year, had been betrothed to the lady Mary, daughter of the duke of Berry; and it was the intention of all parties, that on their arrival at Bourges the marriage should be consummated.

When the contracts had been figned, the marriage ceremony was performed in the cathedral church of St. Stephen, at Bourges, by a valiant prelate, the cardinal of Avignon. The chancellor of Berry and the bishop of Poitiers had betrothed them to each other the year before. There were many grand feasts and entertainments at this wedding of lord Lewis of Blois with the lady Mary of Berry, and the tilts and tournaments of the knights and squires lasted for eight days.

The count and countefs of Blois, when all was over, took leave of the duke of Berry and returned to Blois, accompanied by their daughter-in-law.

This fame year John of Berry, fon of the duke of Berry, and styled count de Montpensier, was married to lady Mary of France, sister to king Charles.

The duchess of Berry, with her son and the lady Mary of France paid a visit to the count and coun-

* Denis Sauvage, in a marginal note, fays, that Froisfart, having omitted to notice these marriages at their proper time, prefers mentioning them here rather than omit them entirely.

They and their attendants were grandly received in the castle of Blois, as the count understood these matters well. I was present at the time of this visit. When the duches and her children had staid three days, they departed for Poitiers; but they went by water down the Loire as far as Amboise, and from thence travelled in cars and on horseback to Poitou. The duches and her children resided for the most part in the fair castle of a handsome town called Chinon*.

In this year died the lady Mary of France, the young bride of the count de Montpensier. Soon after died also, the lady Jane d'Armagnac, duchess of Berry. Thus the duke and his son were left widowers: they, however, married again, but not immediately. I shall speak of these second marriages, more especially of that of the duke, at a proper time, as our history claims that mention be made of it.

* Chinon, an ancient town of France, election of Tours. It is remarkable for the death of Henry II. of England, and the refidence of Charles VII. of France. Rabelais was born very near to it.

CHAP. XX.

WHILE THE COUNCIL OF FRANCE IS IN DELIBERATION WHETHER OR NOT TO MARCH AN ARMY AGAINST THE DUKE OF GUELDRES, THE DUKE OF BERRY SENDS THE COUNT D'ESTAMPES TO THE DUKE OF BRITTANY, TO ENDEAVOUR TO WIN HIM OVER TO THE PARTY OF FRANCE, AFTER HAVING ALIENATED HIMSELF FROM IT BY THE ARREST OF THE CONSTABLE.

HAVE before mentioned the challenge which had been fent by the duke of Gueldres to the king of France. It was much talked of every where, from the uncourteous, and indeed rude language it was faid to contain. I was in truth shewn some rough drafts, which were faid to be exact copies of this challenge; but as I never saw the original, nor any certified copy, I did not give much credit to what so nearly concerned a little prince, like the duke of Gueldres, and a king of France.

It was evident that this conduct had greatly angered the king of France, who seemed determined to have reparation, and expected excuses to be made for it by the duke of Gueldres. The king's council had resolved it should not remain quiet; for the great barons had declared, that if the king did did not shew his refentment, whatever sums it might cost France, they would be alone to blame: for the king had proved, when in Flanders, his willingness to pursue his enemies. The king was young, indeed, but of good courage; and if he suffered such insults with patience, foreign countries would hold the nobility of France very cheap, as they were the king's advisers, and had sworn to guard his honour.

The lord de Coucy took great pains in the council, that no blame might fall on him; and shewed clearly he personally felt the insult. He was better acquainted with the character of the Germans than many others, from his disputes with the duke of Austria, and from different transactions in which he had been engaged with them.

The king's ministers saw that the greater part of the nobles of the realm were for war against Gueldres, and, in particular, the duke of Burgundy, on account of the warfare the duke was carrying on against his aunt, the duches, and the country of Brabant. This duchy reverted to him after the decease of his aunt and her sister *, who were both to.

K 2

* In the 12th annotation of Denis Sauvage, he makes the following observations:

&#x27;Sifter.' 'I should suppose this fister to be Jane, widow of the late William count of Hainault, according to the 30th and 117th chapters of the first volume, if the 257th of the same volume, and the 207th of the second, did not incline me to believe, that this widow was the Jane of Brabant married again old ladies. The duke of Burgundy would very gladly have feen the duke of Gueldres, who was chivalrous enough, checked by fair or foul means.

It was necessary, however, the kingdom should be unanimous in this disposition; for it was a great distance the king of France would have to march into Germany to make conquests and put lords under his obedience; and he must carry with him the whole force of the kingdom; for, as the Germans were fo avaricious, it was uncertain if they would not all unite in the support of the duke of Gueldres. In addition, the duke of Burgundy and the other nobles were aware of the confequences the conduct of the duke of Brittany might lead to; for he shewed his preference of war to peace with France; and the lords of the council knew he was laying provision of stores and artillery in all his strong towns and castles for their defence, in case of being befieged. Befides this, he was constantly fending over letters and messengers to England, to the king and his council, in the most affectionate terms, offering henceforth the strongest friendship, to Winceslaus, last duke of Brabant, who acquired, by his union with her, that duchy. The countess of Flanders, who was fifter to this duchess, died five years before her husband, count Lewis of Flanders, who deceased in the month of January, 1384; so that I suspect the reading should be, 'after the decease of his aunt, who was now very old;' for I cannot say who this fifter was.'

fo that the English might continue the war with the most flattering hopes of success.

The council were unwilling to decide on any bold measures, until this cloud, which hung over Brittany, was removed by fome means or other, fo that the kingdom might not have any fear from that quarter: for, should the king march into Germany, the country would be left defencelefs, and they knew not well how to bring about an accommodation. Those who had been fent into Brittany, the bishop of Langres, sir John de Vienne, and fir John de Bueil, were returned, and had told the king and his uncles of their ill fuccess. Upon this the duke of Berry resolved to send thither his cousin, the count d'Estampes, who was a valiant man and able negotiator. He therefore addressed him in fuch words as thefe,- Fair coufin, I entreat you would go to Brittany: it is abfolutely necessary you should do so, to negotiate with our cousin, the duke of Brittany; and should you find him hot and imperious in speech, do not you mind it, nor put yourfelf in any passion. Treat him gently, and with the greatest attention, and endeavour to make him liften to reason: tell him that the king, myfelf, and brother of Burgundy, wish him every thing good, and bear him the strongest affection; and that, if he would come and live with us, he would find us always ready to ferve him. In respect to the castles which he holds from the constable, fay, jokingly, that, to be fure, he had feized them unjustly, and that, if he would be pleafed to render them back, it would redound greatly greatly to his honour, and the king would give him as rich and as strong ones in any part of the kingdom he may choose. Exert yourself, dear cousin, to bring us back good news; and do not quit him, however you may be delayed, without bringing matters to some fort of a conclusion, taking care to remember all the duke's answers, and to examine well the state of the duchy.'

The count d'Estampes assured the duke he would cheerfully undertake it; and he made no long delay, from the time of this conversation, in his preparations for the journey. When ready, he set out for Brittany, taking his road through Chartres and Mans, and the rich country of Maine to Angers, where he met the queen of Naples, widow of the duke of Anjou, who had styled himself king of Naples, Sicily and Jerusalem, duke of la Puglia, and count de Provence. Her two sons, the lords Lewis and Charles, were with her.

The queen received her coufin, the count d'Eftampes, handfomely, and becoming her fituation; and they had many conversations together, such as lords and ladies are accustomed to have. John of Brittany was likewise there, who was not in the good graces of the duke of Brittany, whither the count was going: but he carried it off as well as he could; for, not having any forces to support his pretensions, he was obliged so to do. The count remained at Angers a day and night, and then took his leave, and departed for Chantoceaux *, where he arrived that day, and then continued his journey to Nantes, where he refreshed himself, and inquired after the duke of Brittany. He was told that he was at Vannes, or in that part of the country, which was his usual place of residence. He took the road for Vannes, where, on his arrival, he waited on the duke, who received him very kindly, for they were nearly connected by blood.

* Chantoceaux, a fmall town, diocese of Nantes.

The count d'Estampes, knowing well how to conduct himself with great princes and dames, for he had been brought up and educated with them, acquitted himself with much prudence when in the presence of the duke, and, dissembling with him, did not, for some days, discover the object of his coming. When he found a proper opportunity, he began upon it with great caution and humility, to gain the duke's affection, in manner something like the following: 'My lord and very dear coufin, you must not be surprised if I am come to see you from such a great distance, for I was very defirous of so doing.' He then continued to inform him, word for word, what the duke of Berry had charged him to say.

The duke of Brittany did not feem to pay any great attention to what he faid, but, when he had done, replied to the count d'Estampes,—' We have in truth heard before what you now tell us, and will consider of it, for we have not as yet done so. You will remain with us as long as you please, for your coming has given us much pleasure.'

The count could not, for the prefent, obtain any other answer; but he continued with the duke, and was lodged within his castle. He staid about fifteen days with the duke of Brittany in Vannes and thereabouts, who treated him with much affection. He shewed him his fair castle of Ermine, which he had newly repaired and beautified, as he there enjoyed himself the most. The count, one day finding him in good humour, again remonstrated with him on his late conduct, and repeated the cause of his coming; but, though the duke's answers were fair, there was no dependance to be placed on his restitution of the hundred thousand francs and the castles to the constable. He did at length restore them; but it was of his own free will, without any request being made, and when it was the least expected, as I will relate in the course of this history, according to the information I received.

The count d'Estampes, finding that a longer stay in Brittany would be useless, determined to take his leave of the duke, and return to France, to the duke of Berry, who had sent him thither. The duke of Brittany parted with him very affectionately, and presented him with a handsome white palfrey, saddled and equipped as if for a king, and a ring with a rich stone, which had cost at least one thousand francs.

The count, on leaving Brittany, went to Angers, where he waited on the queen of Naples and John of Brittany, who were anxious to hear what had passed. They said, 'Fair cousin, you must must have been well employed, for you have made a long stay in Brittany.' He related to them partly what he had done, but the conclusion was, that he had been unsuccessful. When he had remained with them one day, he departed for Tours, and continued his journey into Berry, and sound the duke of Berry at Mehun-sur-Yevre*, where he had lately built a very fine castle, and was daily adding to it.

The duke of Berry entertained the count well, and inquired what had passed in Brittany. The count told him, word for word, the conversation between him and the duke, and that it had been impossible to turn him from his purposes, whatever they might be. The duke of Berry, seeing nothing better could be done, made light of it, and, shortly after, returned to the king and the duke of Burgundy, to relate to them the ill success of the journey the count d'Estampes had undertaken, at his request, to Brittany. As they saw they could not do more, affairs remained in this state.

* Mehun-fur-Yevre, a town in Berry on the Yevre, four leagues from Bourges.

CHAP. XXI.

THE CASTILLIANS AND FRENCH, AFTER THE DEPARTURE OF THE DUKE OF LANCASTER FROM GALICIA, RE-CONQUER, IN A VERY SHORT TIME, ALL THE TOWNS AND CASTLES HE HAD WON.—THE ENGLISH ABUSE CASTILLE, WHEN IN THEIR OWN COUNTRY.—THE KING OF FRANCE AND HIS COUNCIL INVITE THE DUKE OF IRELAND, WHO HAD FLED FROM ENGLAND, TO PARIS.

YOU have before heard how the English, who had come with the duke of Lancaster to Galicia, had departed, and how the duke and duchess had retired to Oporto, where they had resided some time with king John of Portugal, who had married the duke's daughter. The duke of Lancaster was very disconsolate that his affairs had taken so ruinous a turn, and that his best knights and squires had fallen victims to disease.

The whole country of Galicia was now returned to its allegiance to the king of Castille; for the moment the Castillians, and the french knights under sir Oliver du Guesclin, heard of the duke of Lancaster's departure for Portugal, and that sew English had remained behind, they fallied forth to conquer Galicia back again, which was soon done. The inhabitants of cities and towns were more attached to the king of Castille than to the duke of Lancaster, provided, however, he was able to keep the field; for the Castillians and Galicians resemble a good deal the Lombards and Italians, who are always on the fide of the strongest, and shout out, 'The conqueror for ever!'

All which the duke of Lancaster had been able to win before the beginning of July was regained, and the places garrifoned again by French and others under the obedience of the king of Castille. The English, who thought to pass the winter quietly there, were driven out by fair or foul means, for fuch as made refistance were put to death.-Others, feeing affairs go badly, furrendered on having passports given them to return through Castille to Gafcony by Bayonne and Bourdeaux. The duke of Lancaster was duly informed of all this when at Oporto, and not being able any way to provide a remedy, it gave him great unquietness of heart. This may be readily believed, for the higher the fpirit and expectations are, the greater and more bitter are disappointments when things turn out contrary.

He, however, kept up his courage tolerably well, and faid at times, that if he had been unfuccessful this year, through the grace of God, he should do better another; for the fortunes of this world are so changeable, they cannot remain always the same.

The king of Portugal comforted him as much as was in his power, faying,—' Sir, you will keep your flate in this country, while you write to your brothers and friends in England the melancholy event of your expedition, though they be now fully fully informed of all, and press them to send you, early in March next, five or six hundred spears and two thousand archers. I will re-assemble my forces, for my subjects are well inclined to sight the Castillians, and we will make an effectual war against them. A kingdom may be won and lost in one campaign.'

The duke, on hearing the king thus discourse, was much pleafed, and returned him his thanks. But, notwithstanding the king of Portugal had held fuch language to induce his father-in-law to take courage, the duke was not ignorant that England was in a very troubled state, that the council had many weighty things to attend to, as well respecting the affairs of the borders of Scotland, which gave them much uneafinefs, as concerning the duke of Brittany, who was negotiating important treaties with them. He remembered also that he had many difficulties to obtain the force he had brought with him to Galicia, and that, knowing his countrymen well, he had never had any intention of feeking a reinforcement, for he was aware the country at prefent was as heavily pressed as it was able to bear; that those who had gone home from Castille would never return thither, and he was fearful they would discourage any others from coming to his aid. Although he knew all this, he did not behave well to the king and barons of Portugal in hiding it from them.

After refiding fome time at Oporto, he told the king, that many reasons urged him to return to Bayonne and the Bordelois; for that Portugal, though though he was fo agreeably received there by all, was not his own inheritance. He added, that as there were fo many strong places and castles in the archbishoprick of Bordeaux, on the borders of Foix, Armagnac, beyond the Garonne and Dordogne, in Quercy, Perigord, Limoufin, Auvergne and other parts, which were still attached to the English, and whose garrisons were carrying on a war under his name: it therefore was his duty to go thither, and give them aid and advice, should there be occasion. He was besides, when in Portugal, too remote to hear news from England; for the English dread the voyage to Portugal, for its length and danger of meeting castillian, galician or feville veffels, which cover that fea, either in going to, or returning from Flanders, with merchandife.

For these and other reasons, the duke of Lancaster made his preparations for departure; and when the galleys, which the king of Portugal had provided for him, under the command of his principal admiral Alphonso Bretat, were ready, and the weather favourable, he and his duchess took leave of the king, their daughter, and the barons of Portugal, and embarked and put to sea. They coasted the shores, and, having wind and weather fair, arrived safely at Bayonne in a sew days. The inhabitants of Bayonne and the adjacent parts were much rejoiced at their arrival, for they desired greatly their coming, and waited on them to pay their respects. News of the duke and duchess being at Bayonne with their daughter was spread far and near, and gave much pleasure to Bordeaux and the Bordelois.

Sir John Harpedon, fénéfchal of Bordeaux, and the fénéfchal des Landes, with other gentlemen of the country, fuch as the lord de Mucident, the lords de Duras, de Rofem, de Landuras, de Chaumont, de l'Esparre, de Copane, and several more of the principal barons and knights, paid their compliments to the duke. He received them kindly as they came, for they arrived separately. All offered him such services and affection as are due to a lord.

The duke refided this feafon at Bayonne. frequently wrote to the king of England and to his brothers; but, for whatever he could urge, he had not any reinforcement of men at arms or archers; and, as things were then fituated, the duke of Lancaster and his concerns were totally difregarded. Those who had returned from Castille gave fuch accounts as discouraged others from going thither. They faid, 'The voyage was fo long, a war with France would be far more advan-France has a rich country and temperate climate, with fine rivers; but Castille has nothing but rocks and high mountains, a sharp air, muddy rivers, bad meat, and wines fo hot and harsh there is no drinking them. The inhabitants are poor and filthy, badly clothed and lodged, and quite different in their manners to us, fo that it would be folly to go thither. When you enter a large city or town, you expect to find every thing, but you will meet with nothing but wines, lard, and empty coffers.

coffers. It is quite the contrary in France; for there we have many a time found, in the cities and towns, when the fortune of war delivered them into our hands, fuch wealth and riches as aftonished us. It is fuch a war as this we ought to attend to, and boldly hazard our lives, for it is very profitable, and not in a war with Castille or Portugal, where there is nothing but poverty and loss to be suffered.'

Such were the conversations of the English who had returned from Castille, so that the ministers who ruled the country, perceived that any expedition thither would be very unpopular. The country was not as yet recovered from the late troubles, which the executions of sir Robert Tresilian and others, and the slight of the duke of Ireland, had thrown it into. The king had also new counsellors, with whom he was not, at that time, well reconciled. All these things prevented any attention being paid to what related to the duke of Lancaster, who still resided at Bayonne.

The fituation of England, with respect to its internal divisions, the desperate state of the affairs of the duke of Lancaster, and all that related to the duke of Ireland and his partisans, were perfectly known to the king of France and his council. To gain more information on these subjects, the king, by the advice of his uncles, resolved to invite the duke of Ireland into France, and to send to him at Utrecht, where he resided, proper passports for his coming thither, and for remaining as long as it should be the king's pleasure, and to return whenever the duke fliould pleafe. It was neceffary to fend special messengers, and that his passport should be particularly made out, otherwise the duke would not quit Utrecht; for he knew he was in the ill graces of the lord de Coucy, (who was a great baron, and of high birth, in France) and not without cause, for, to say the truth, he had very fcandaloufly treated his duchefs, the daughter of the lord de Coucy. This certainly was the principal reason that had blasted his character in France and elfewhere; for he was there as much hated and despised as in England. When this matter was discussed in the council of France, the lord de Coucy strongly opposed it; but they gave so many reasons for the advantages that might be reaped from the duke's coming, as to induce him to yield: indeed, as the king willed it, he could not fay more.

The king, being young, was defirous to fee the duke of Ireland, because he had been told he was a gallant knight, and that the king of England's love for him had been unbounded. A knight and clerk, who was one of the king's notaries, were fent to feek him.

The duke of Ireland was very much aftonished when he first heard the king of France wished to see him, and had many ideas what could be the cause of it. Having considered the passport, he sound he might safely go to the king in France, and return to Utrecht when he pleased. He therefore lest Utrecht, in company with those who had been sent for him, and continued his journey until he arrived at Paris; for the king then refided at the castle of the Louvre. The duke was well received by the king and his uncles; and the king was desirous he would fix his residence in France, and had an hôtel appointed for him to live and keep his state. He had wherewithal to do so handsomely, for he had brought immense sums of money with him from England, and the constable of France was still much indebted to him for the ransom of John of Brittany, as the whole had not been paid. The duke of Ireland made frequent visits to the king, who entertained him well, and he was invited to all the feasts, tilts and tournaments.

CHAP. XXII.

THE COUNCIL OF FRANCE DISAGREE, AS TO THE KING'S GOING INTO GERMANY, ON ACCOUNT OF THE STATE OF THE REALM.—THE DUKE OF BRITTANY STRENGTHENS HIS GARRISONS, AND FORMS ALLIANCES WITH ENGLAND AND THE KING OF NAVARRE.—THE ENGLISH RAISE A LARGE ARMY.

YOU have before heard how the count d'Eftampes was fent by the duke of Berry into Brittany, in the hopes of conciliating the duke of Brittany, and had returned unfuccessful, to the great vexation of the duke of Berry, but more particularly to that of the king's council; for they knew the eagerness of the king to march to Ger-Vol. IX.

many, to revenge himself for the rude and outrageous challenge the duke of Gueldres had sent him.

The wifest of the council, foreseeing what might happen, thought it would be too dangerous for the king, at this moment, to leave the realm. They now clearly faw the duke of Brittany would not listen to terms of accommodation, and felt his conduct, in arresting, confining, and ransoning the constable for one hundred thousand francs, three caftles and a town, highly offenfive to the honour of France. They heard also, that the duke had entered into a ftrong alliance with the king of England, and was laying up stores of all kinds in his different towns and castles. He was seeking friends on all fides, fo that his barons and knights knew not how to act, (or at least the greater part) whether to go to France, or remain with the duke and abide the event; but they would never have taken arms against France, for the knights and fquires of Brittany are too loyal Frenchmen to be induced to be guilty of fuch conduct. The council were fearful, and with reason, should the king march to Germany with a large force, and he could not do otherwife, that the duke of Brittany would introduce the English to his country, by Saint Malo, Saint Matthieu, Kemper, Treguier, Guerrande, Vannes, or on fome other parts of the coast, for they could not gain a better entrance into France. They were, therefore, much puzzled, how they could, without compromifing the king's honour and that of the realm, bring about a reconciliation conciliation with the duke. But fome of the council faid, 'that it would be very blameable in the king to put off his expedition for this duke of Brits tany, who was not mafter of his own country; and he might be affured that the knights and barons of Brittany would never fide with him against the king of France. Let the king, in God's name, undertake the expedition, and the constable, with his Bretons, may stay at home to guard the country.' This opinion was ably supported in the council; but others opposed it, faying, 6 It cannot be done, for the king will never undertake it without the constable, as he knows more of war than any other knight.' Some argued, faying, 'Let the king then remain, and fend thither one of his uncles, for instance my lord of Burgundy, with two thousand lances and feven thousand lufty varlets; for, as the war principally affects him, he is bound to go thither, from his connection with Brabant, which is the feat of war; and he will be joined, when in that country, by feven hundred fpears, and from twenty to thirty thousand of the common people.' "What you fay is to no purpose,' others replied, ' for the king is determined to go, as commander in chief: he fays, fince he has been challenged, he will not refuse it. It is proper he should therefore go; and, as he is young, the oftener he bears arms, the more will he like them.' 'All this is well,' faid fome, 'but who will be bold enough to advife the king to march fo far into Germany, and among fuch proud and crafty people? The entrance may be eafy enough, but not fo the L 2 return:

return; for, when they know that the king of France and his nobles are in the heart of their country, they will collect together at some of the passes they are acquainted with, and of which we are ignorant, and completely destroy us. They are the most avaricious of mankind, and the most cruel to their prisoners; for, when they take any in war, they throw them into close dungeons, loaded with fetters, and fuch like prison furniture: they are cunning enough in these matters, in order to obtain a larger ranfom from them. They are in the highest spirits when they make captive a nobleman or man of rank, and carry him with them into Bohemia, Austria, or Saxony, and confine him in fome uninhabited castle, where you must seek for him. Such people are worse than Pagans or Saracens, for their extreme covetousness robs them of all ideas of honour. Now, if you conduct the king to fuch a country, and any melancholy event happen, and who can foresee what unfortunate accidents may not occur? it will be faid that we have advifed him, like traitors, to his ruin, and not for the welfare of him or the kingdom. But, should the king perfift in this expedition (God defend the realm from harm!) whom will he take with him, and what nobles are to attend him? for he must be properly accompanied, and the country, being left empty of defenders, is in risk of total destruction. Who will now advise the king to undertake this matter in person?' 'What can be done then?' faid others in reply. 'Why,' answered those who had more maturely confidered the matter, and weighed weighed all the difficulties attending it, 'let the king think no more of it, nor fend any confiderable force thither. The duke of Gueldres is young and hot-headed, and puffed up with having challenged' a king of France. It has not proceeded from any folid understanding, but from the felffufficiency of a young man, who wants to fly before he has wings. Since he has fent his defiance, let him follow it up: the kingdom of France is large, and the moment he shall enter it, whatever part it may be, the king will be instantly informed of it, and have just cause for calling on his subjects for fupport, and for marching to repel the invader, should he have remained in France, or for purfuing him into Germany. The king will, by fuch conduct, acquire honour for himfelf and his kingdom, at a much cheaper rate than by marching into Gueldres. We have been informed, by those well acquainted with the country, that there are four large rivers to pass before you arrive at the duke's territories, and that the smallest is as wide as the Loire at Nemours or la Charité, and the country bad to march through, and worse to be quartered in. Now, those who please may advife the king to undertake his expedition through fuch a country.'

Thus, as I have faid, was the council divided respecting this expedition to Gueldres, which the king was very anxious to accomplish. Indeed, more progress would have been made towards it, if they had not been asraid of the mischief that might come from Brittany; and this delayed it much.

There

There was cause for their sears; for the duke, who had received information of the challenge of the duke of Gueldres, and of the king's eagerness to march against him, was only waiting until the king had quitted the kingdom, to introduce the English, with whom he had formed an alliance, into his duchy.

The duke had, by his fubtle arts, gained over the principal towns to his interest, fuch as Nantes, Vannes, Rennes, Treguier, Guerrande, Lamballe, St. Malo, and St. Matthieu de Fine Pôterne, but had failed in his attempts to gain the nobles. He hoped, indeed, they would accompany the constable into Germany, and give him freer scope for his war. He filled his towns and castles with all forts of stores, artillery and provisions, plainly shewing he preferred war to peace.

He had likewise formed a strict alliance with his brother-in-law, the young king of Navarre, and had promised him, that if he succeeded in his attempt to bring over a body of english men at arms and archers, he would lead them instantly to Normandy, and recover for him all those towns and places the late king of France had won from his father by himself, or the lord de Coucy and others. The king of Navarre indulged in these hopes, and paid every respectful compliment to the duke of Lancaster at Bayonne, with whom he entered into an alliance.

On the 7th day of April, in the year of grace 1388, it was determined in the council of the king of England, by the dukes of York and Glocester, that Richard earl of Arundel should be appointed commander in chief of a naval expedition. He was to have under him one thousand men at arms and three thousand archers, who were to assemble at Southampton the 15th of May, when the sleet would be ready prepared to receive them, and it was fixed that those who were to accompany him were immediately to begin their march to Southampton.

The king of England kept a grand feast on St. George's day, this year, at Windfor, which was attended by a number of the lords who were to accompany the earl of Arundel, and who there took leave of the king, the queen, his uncles and ladies. The whole of this armament were at Southampton, or in those parts, on the appointed day, and embarked on board the fleet the 20th day of May, when the weather was fine and clear. With the earl of Arundel were, the earls of Nottingham and Devonshire, the lord Thomas Percy, the lord Clifford, fir John de Warwick, fir William Shellie, the lord Camois, fir Stephen de Liberie, fir William Elmham, fir Thomas Moreaux, fir John d'Ambreticourt, sir Robert Sere, sir Peter de Montberry, fir Lewis Clanbow, fir Thomas Cook, fir William Paulet, and feveral more: in the whole, there were one thousand good men at arms and about three thousand archers. They embarked no horses with them; for they hoped, if successful, to find horses in plenty in Brittany. The day they weighed anchor, the fea was fo calm and ferene, that it was beautiful to behold. They made for the shores of Brittany or Normandy, with a determination to land no where else, unless other intelligence should be sent them. They had in their sleet some light vessels (called Balniers Coursiers) which drew but little water, and these were sent in advance, to seek adventures, in the same manner as knights and squires, mounted on the sleetest horses, are ordered to scour in front of an army, to see if there are any ambuscades. We will, however, leave this army, and speak of the affairs of Gueldres and Brabant, and of the siege of Grave.

CHAP. XXIII.

THE BRABANTERS LAY SIEGE TO THE TOWN OF GRAVE.—THE CONSTABLE OF FRANCE GAINS THE TOWNS OF SAINT MALO AND SAINT MATTHIEU DE FINE PÔTERNE, AND GARRISONS THEM WITH HIS MEN.

HAVE before given an account of the ancient dukes of Gueldres, and how the eldest son of the first duke married Bertaldo of Mechlin's daughter, in order to redeem his inheritance, and had mortgaged three of his castles to the count de Mours, who, unable to regain the money he had lent, had sold them to Winceslaus duke of Brabant for the same sum, and all the subsequent events to the time of duke William of Gueldres, fon of the duke of Juliers.

This duke of Gueldres, finding he could no way fucceed in recovering his before-mentioned three castles on the Meuse, which had been part of his patrimonial inheritance, resolved to secure himself the possession of Grave from the Brabanters. He had married his bastard-daughter to the young lord of Bruk, who claimed the town of Grave as lord paramount. There was an amicable treaty made between them, such as should be made when fathers and children are concerned; and the young lord of Bruk yielded to the duke all his claims on Grave, and the territories thereto belonging, in the presence of the knights of Gueldres and Juliers.

The duke of Gueldres gave him, in return, the town and territory of Breda, fituated on the river Merck, in the duchy of Gueldres, bordering on Holland, below Brabant. It had a handsome castle: the town was extensive and of much trade, but Grave was more valuable. The duke had made this exchange to strengthen himself against the claim of the Brabanters; but the duchess and her subjects said, that the lord of Bruk was only mortgagee in possession, and that she or her heirs might redeem it whenever they pleased. The duke of Gueldres denied this, and hence arose their mutual hatreds and wars.

The Brabanters this year, in the month of May, came with a powerful force of barons, knights and fquires, to lay fiege to the town of Grave. They brought brought with them fpringalls, and various other machines of attack, and they amounted altogether to forty thousand men. There were almost daily skirmishes at the barriers. The town of Grave is situated on the brabant side of the Meuse, over which there is a bridge that connects it with Gueldres.

This fiege was a bold enterprise; but great plenty was in the army of Brabant, and every thing was to be had there for money, and as cheap as at Brusfels. In these continual skirmishes at the barriers, where the cross-bows sometimes ventured, the success was variable, as must always happen when the parties are nearly equal.

The duke of Gueldres was regularly informed of every thing that passed at the siege, for he had fixed his residence only sour leagues off at Nimeguen. He wrote frequently to England for assistance, and was in hopes the armament at sea under the earl of Arundel, should the winds prove favourable, would come to raise this siege. He knew the town of Grave was strong, and that it was amply supplied with stores and provisions, and could not be won by storm. As it could only be gained by capitulation, he selt assured on that head, as he depended on the sidelity of the inhabitants, that they would never desert him. This siege, therefore, lasted a very considerable time.

The earl of Arundel's fleet was still at sea, and, though no landing had been attempted, it hovered along the coasts of Brittany and Normandy, so that the Normans, from St. Michael's Mount along the shore shore to Dieppe, Saint Valery, and even Crotoy in Ponthieu, were much alarmed, and uncertain at what place they would difembark. All these seaport towns were well provided with men at arms, by orders from the king of France, to oppose any invasion.

The marshal de Blainville, who commanded on the coast, sent the lord de Coucy and the lord de Hambre, two great norman barons, to the town of Carentan, which is situated on the sea-shore, and formerly belonged to Charles king of Navarre. The constable of France took possession of the towns of Saint Malo and Saint Matthieu de Fine Pôterne; and, as soon as he learnt the English were at sea, he placed sufficient garrisons in both, in the name of the king of France.

It was thought in France, that war would be declared against the duke of Brittany. The knights and squires said, that this appearance of the english sleet was another instance of the duke's persidy; for, by their continued hovering along his coasts, it was clear that he had invited them thither. They never quitted their stations, unless forced by stress of weather, and, when savourable, returned to them again.

CHAP. XXIV.

THE DUKE OF LANCASTER HAS INTENTIONS OF MARRYING HIS DAUGHTER TO THE DUKE DE LA TOURAINE, BROTHER TO THE KING OF FRANCE.—THE DUKE OF BERRY PROPOSES HIMSELF FOR HER HUSBAND.—THE DUKE OF LANCASTER IS MUCH SATISFIED THEREAT.

HAVE before faid that the duke of Lancaster had quitted Castille and Portugal. His thoughts, on the unfortunate event of his expedition, were not very agreeable; for he saw his hopes annihilated, and that fortune, as very often happens in worldly assairs, had suddenly turned against him, at a time when it was the least expected: for he had left England well accompanied with men at arms, and with every expectation of finishing his campaign in a different manner. It was told him that his adversary had regained, within sisteen days after he had left the country, all his conquests, which had occupied him fix weeks.

His army had been wasted away by sickness, and he despaired of any assistance from home; for the English were tired of this war, as it was at such a distance, and the accounts they had heard of the country disgusted them: besides, the duke knew that England was much troubled within itself. He foresaw little hope of amendment in his affairs; and though he said not much on this subject, he thought a great deal.

At times, he compared himself and his expedition to the duke of Anjou and his march to Naples; for, when he set out from France, he was so magnificently equipped, nothing was ever seen like to it, and attended by multitudes of knights, squires and men at arms; but the end had been, that all were either killed or ruined.

It was not furprifing that the duke, confidering his hopes were totally destroyed, should be sometimes melancholy; for the count de Foix, who was one of the wifest princes, in conversation with his knights, had declared the duke of Lancaster's expectations, in regard to the crown of Castille, were completely at an end. The duke was, however, of a high spirit, and sought consolation in the profpect of the elevation of his children. He had with him a handsome daughter, by the lady Constance, daughter of don Pedro, in whose right he had made war on Castille: he, therefore, musing on this fubject, faid,—' If fortune is now unfavourable to me, it may be otherwise to my daughter, who is young and handsome, and by her grandfather and mother the true heirefs of Castille. Some gallant prince of France may feek her in marriage, either for the above right or her high birth; for the may boast that she springs from the best blood in Christendom.' He would gladly have had fome overtures made him from France on this head; for he knew the king had a younger brother, in the duke of Touraine: 'and,' added the duke, 'we might, through his means, recover our inheritance of Caftille; for it has been folely through the aid of France that our adversary has kept his crown: should that power turn against him, which would be the case if a marriage took place with the duke of Touraine, he must speedily surrender his throne to my daughter.'

Such were the expectations the duke of Lancafter flattered himself with, and his imaginations were in a way to be realized; not, indeed, by the king of France's brother, but by one who was well qualified to change the face of affairs in Castille, and who had the complete government of France, for without his consent nothing was done: I mean the duke of Berry.

You have before heard how he and his fon were made widowers nearly at the fame time. What I am about to relate, I know from my own knowledge; for I, the author of this book, was at the time in the country of Blois, on the borders of Poitou and Berry, with my very dear and honoured lord, the count Guy de Blois, by whose desire and encouragement this history was undertaken.

The duke of Berry had, among his other thoughts and plans, a defign to marry again. He frequently faid to those near his person, that a lord was nothing without a lady, nor a man without a wife. Those in whom he had the greatest considence replied; 'Very well, my lord, marry then your son John: your house will be more pleasant, and better managed.' 'Ah,' faid the duke, 'he is too young.' 'That is nothing, my lord: do not you fee the count de Blois has married his fon, who is of the fame age, with your daughter Mary?' 'That is true,' answered the duke: 'well, name then a lady for him.' 'We name the daughter of the duke of Lancaster.' The duke mused a while, and was fome time before he made any reply, when, addressing himself to them, he said,—' You propose marrying my fon John with my cousin, the daughter of the duke of Lancaster: by St. Denis, you have made me imagine that she will be an excellent match for myself, and I will shortly write to the duke on the subject. He resides, as I hear, at Bayonne; and I will fignify to him that some of my council shall very speedily wait on him to treat of this marriage with me, I fay: not for my fon John, whom I will marry elsewhere.'

Those to whom he had spoken, on hearing the above, burst out into laughter. 'What do you laugh at?' faid the duke. 'We laugh, my lord, because it seems that you prefer to have a good thing yourself, rather than give it your son.' 'By my faith, I am in the right; for my fair cousin of Lancaster will not so readily give his daughter to my son as he will to me.'

Letters were instantly written, and sent to the duke of Lancaster. The messengers, on their arrival at Bayonne, presented the letters to the duke, who, having opened them and perused their contents, was highly delighted, and made those who had brought them good cheer, giving them to understand, derstand, that their intelligence was very agreeable to him. The duke returned such answers by the messengers as shewed the proposal was very satisfactory, and had given him much joy.

The messengers, on their return, sound the duke of Berry in Poitou, but preparing to return to Paris; for the king and the duke of Burgundy had expressly sent for him, to consider of the state of Brittany. Having read the answer from the duke of Lancaster, which afforded him much pleasure, he determined to persevere in the business, although he could not defer his journey to Paris. He resolved, however, to proceed in it by the shortest mode, and sent letters to one of his knights, called fir Helion de Lignac, who at that time was sénéschal of la Rochelle, ordering him to place the town under the government of those he could depend upon, and then, without fail, to hasten to him at Paris.

Sir Helion, on receiving the duke's orders, fealed with his feal, and noticing the hafte in which he was fummoned to follow him, loft no time in putting la Rochelle and its dependencies under the command of two valiant knights of Beauce, called fir Peter de Jouy and the lord Peter Taillepiè. When this was done, he took the shortest road he could to join the duke, who he knew, from the tenor of his letter, would be impatient to see him.

We will return to the duke of Lancaster at Bayonne, and say what were his thoughts on the proposal from the duke of Berry. He was not willing it should be kept secret: on the contrary, he published it every where, that his enemies might be alarmed, and the matter known in the court of his adversary of Castille. The duke, in consequence, wrote feveral letters, detailing the whole bufinefs, with copies of the duke of Berry's proposals, and his answers of consent to the count de Foix, because he knew there was a continual intercourfe of knights and fquires from all countries at Orthès, going or returning to Castille, or on pilgrimage to or from Sant Jago. He did the fame to the king of Navarre, who had married the king of Castille's fifter, and by whom he had a numerous family, that the intelligence of this marriage might be more readily believed in Castille than if told by common report. He wrote also on the fame fubject to the king of Portugal, but was filent respecting it in his letters to the king and his brothers in England, for he knew the English would not be pleafed at it: Indeed, they gave proofs of their dislike to this marriage, as soon as they heard of it, as I shall relate when I am come to that part of my history; but I must now return to the duke of Brittany, as that matter preffes.

CHAP. XXV.

THE LORD DE COUCY AND OTHER BARONS OF FRANCE ARE SENT TO THE DUKE OF BRITTANY.

—BEFORE THEIR ARRIVAL, HE HAD RESTORED TO THE OFFICERS OF THE CONSTABLE THE PLACES HE HAD TAKEN FROM HIM.

ON the duke of Berry's arrival at Paris, many councils were held by those most in the confidence of the king and his uncles, fuch as the bishops of Langres and Laon, the lord de Coucy and other privy counfellors, as well on the affairs of Gueldres, whither the king was still very defirous of going, as of Brittany; for the duke would not accept of the advances that had been made him towards a reconciliation with France. They knew not whom they could fend to make another attempt, fince the former negotiators had failed. The council were much troubled on this account, for they had learnt that the duke of Brittany had been bufily employed during the winter in victualling again and reinforcing all his towns and castles, which plainly indicated his wish to have been for war.

The wifest of the council said,—' You talk of going to Germany: you should rather go to Brittany, tany, and destroy that insolent duke, who holds in contempt the crown of France and refuses to obey its orders. You will not obtain any thing from him by treaty; and his prefumption is fo great, he must be taught his duty: he neither loves nor esteems any one but himfelf. It is clear, that if the king go to Germany, and leave the realm unprotected by men at arms, (and unlefs he be handfomely attended, he need not think of it,) this duke will introduce the English into his country, and give them an entrance to France. The appearances are now very strong that he will do so; for there is a large english fleet on his coasts, which never leaves them but when forced to it by stress of weather, and when fair it returns; fo that I fee no alternative; you must have open war or peace.'

'It would be well,' replied others, 'that we again fend to him the bishop of Langres and the count de St. Pol, for this last is by marriage his brother-in-law*.' 'Oh no, no,' interrupted fir Yves d'Orient: 'if you will fend to him again, you cannot fend one more agreeable to him, nor of greater weight, than the lord de Coucy; for they are connected by marriage, and have always had a great affection for each other; and to the lord de Coucy add whomsoever you please.'

Since you have made this proposal, fir Yves,'

* The duke of Brittany and the count de St. Pol married two daughters of Sir John Holland, earl of Kent.

faid the duke of Burgundy, 'name those who you think should accompany the lord de Coucy.'— 'Willingly,' replied fir Yves: 'if you please, then, fir John de Vienne and the lord de la Riviere shall go with him. They are three very intelligent lords; and, if any can make him listen to reason, they will.'

' We agree to this,' faid the dukes of Berry and Burgundy.

Although the three lords were instructed what they were to fay, and how to act, and to use every amicable means to fettle the business, they did not quit Paris immediately. The duke of Brittany heard, before these noblemen lest France, of their mission, but those who had informed him knew not the particulars they were charged with. He was confident, however, it related to matters of great importance, by the lord de Coucy's appointment. He frequently meditated on the fubject, and opened his thoughts to some of the most considential of his council, for them to give him advice how to act. It was commonly reported,' he faid, 'that the duke of Lancaster was about marrying his daughter in France to the duke of Berry, and that matters had gone fo far that fir Helion de Lignac was on his road to Bayonne to conclude the bufiness with the duke, who was well inclined to it. Such a report furprifed him exceedingly; for the duke of Lancaster, who was his brother-in-law, had never written to him on the fubject, and all he knew was from public rumour. This filence had not been usual to him formerly, for whenever any of his affairs had a connection with France, he regularly had informed him of them.'

His council replied, - Sir, you must alter your plans, whatever they may be, or you may be too great a lofer, and bring destruction on your country. This you should dread; for what occasion have you to go to war fince you are now at peace, and they are begging you to remain fo? Your lady is far gone with child, and you should pay attention that in her fituation she be not alarmed. The king of Navarre can give you but little support, for he has enough to do himself. The duke of Lancaster is a valiant and wife prince; but he marries, as they fay, his daughter to the duke of Berry. This will be the foundation for a long peace between France and England, and various treaties will be formed in confequence. You will fee fhortly the king of Castille driven from his throne; for, as the French feated him on it, they can as eafily dethrone him: indeed, more eafily, for they will have the aid of the duke of Lancaster and the English. We have in truth heard, that the lord de Coucy, the admiral of France and the lord de la Riviere are coming hither, and you may suppose it must be on affairs of the greatest consequence to the king and kingdom, or on the matter of the constable of France, whose cause the king has warmly espoused. They are probably ordered to know positively what are your intentions, and if you perfift in your former opinions. Should this last be the case, we suppose (for one may judge toderably well from appearances) that the immense force.

force, now rumoured to be destined against Gueldres, will be turned against you. Now consider from whom you may expect affiftance, should war be declared by France, as it most certainly will be unless you consent to a reconciliation, should the duke of Lancaster marry his daughter to the duke of Berry; and this he will do, for where can he ally himfelf better in regard to the recovery of his inheritance? The majority of prelates, barons, knights and principal towns of the duchy are in opposition to you. We therefore fay, fince you ask our advice, that it is at this moment more than ever requifite for you to confider well your fituation, and to avoid risking the loss of your country, which has cost you so much labour and blood to gain. We know how great your hatred is to fir Oliver de Cliffon, and that you have mutually shewn your diflikes to each other; but you must soften it some little, at least in appearance, for fince the king of France, his uncles and barons have taken up his quarrel, they will support him: he is and will continue their constable. Had the late king been alive, who loved him fo much, and you had acted the fame, we know it would have cost the king half of his kingdom, but he would have made you fuffer for the injury done him. The present king, his fon, is young, and does not pay that attention to affairs which may be expected from him, if he live, ten years hence: he is coming on the stage, and you are going off. Should you, therefore, engage in a new war with France, after all we have faid, it will be contrary to our opinions, and to those of every man who has any attachment to you. You must dissemble at present what your real inclinations may be. What is to you the holding thefe castles from sir Oliver de Clisson, which form part of his inheritance, confidering the manner in which you gained them? and, whether you have peace or war, they will cost you more to guard for three years than ever you will gain from them in twelve. Give them back, therefore, handfomely; and when the rumour shall be spread abroad, for there is no fire without finoke, that you have fo done of your own free will, you will pacify the anger of many, and greatly please the duke of Burgundy, who has never interfered fo much in this business as he might, had he fo pleafed, through the good offices of your coufin the duchess of Burgundy: this we know for fact. She has a numerous family, who are now your nearest relations: recollect, therefore, whence your origin, and who are your connections, and do not estrange yourself from those with whom you ought to be more strongly united: it will be madness if you do, and you will be undeferving pity for what confequences may enfue. Have no connection with England: the English have sufficient employment at home. They will make you great protestations of friendship, in order to take their advantage of it, and nothing more: this you know, for you were in your youth brought up among them.'

The duke was much struck on hearing such very forcible reasoning, and remained some time leaning over a window that opened into a court, without making any reply. His council were standing behind him; and, after some musing, he turned round and said,—'I perceive clearly that you have well and honestly advised me. I want nothing but good counsel, and yet how can I pretend to cherish love where I only feel hate? How can I ever love fir Oliver de Clisson, who has given me such repeated causes for hatred? and the thing I most repent of in this world is, the not having put him to death when I had him in my castle of Ermine.'

' In the name of God, fir,' replied those near him, ' had you put him to death, you could never have possessed yourself of his estates, for there is an appeal from this duchy to the parliament of Paris. John of Brittany and the fon of the vifcount de Rohan are his heirs by marriage with his two daughters, and would of right have succeeded to his estates; and you are much blamed for what you have already done respecting the three castles, by their friends in France. The constable has made his complaints to the chamber of parliament at Paris, where fentence will be given against you, for you have no one there to make any defence for what he may accuse you of. When you shall have lost this cause, sir Oliver de Clisson and his heirs will be intitled to follow up the judgment by force of arms; and, should the king and country take part in affifting them, you must have a greater power than we know you have at this moment to make any refistance. It will therefore be more to your advantage, if, while this matter is pending, you furrender up these castles, and be thanked for fo doing, rather than wait until judgment be given against you, with heavy damages. You will also regain the good will of your subjects, which is certainly worth having, and live in peace with those whose affections you should wish to preserve; I mean the king of France, who is your fovereign and natural lord, and my lord of Burgundy and his children, your cousins. You have feen an example in your own time in the late earl of Flanders, your coufin-german, who, though a valiant and wife prince, was, through extraordinary events, at the latter end of his days, nearly driven out of his inheritance; but, by humbling himfelf to the king of France and his uncles, they affifted him in the recovery of his country.'

'Well,' replied the duke, 'I fee fince I have asked your advice, it will be proper for me to follow what you have said.'

I believe every thing went on well afterwards; at least, such were the appearances; for the duke of Brittany, who had hitherto kept possession of the constable's castles, now remanded his men from them, and gave up their possession to the officers of fir Oliver de Clisson. This was the first act of moderation on his part: but it did not satisfy the king nor council of France, who insisted on the restitution of the money that had been paid as part of the ransom, and that the duke should come to Paris, and personally make excuses for his conduct to the king, in the presence of the peers of France, and submit to such punishment as the king and his peers might, after great deliberation, adjudge him.

The three envoys to Brittany were well pleafed when they heard of the restitution of the constable's castles, and the lord de Coucy said,—' Now, gentlemen, we have one obstacle the less to surmount, and I suppose the duke will listen to what we may have to say to him.'

I was told, that before these three barons left Paris, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy held feveral private confultations with them, and recommended them to use every gentle method to bring matters to a favourable conclusion, in preference to harsh ones; and to prevail on the duke to come to Paris, or at least half way to the town of Blois, where they would meet him and hold a conference together. The three barons, who were prudent and had received their full instructions, said, they would use their utmost endeavours to comply with their wishes. On leaving Paris, they continued their journey until they came to the city of Rennes in Brittany, where, on asking for the duke, they learnt he was at Vannes, whither they went.

Their coming was already known in the household of the duke, for they had sent forward servants to prepare their lodgings. The duke had assembled his council and the principal barons of Brittany near his person, to shew them the more honour. They were well received on their entering Vannes, by the knights and others of the duke's household, who had gone forth to meet them, and in particular by the lord de Laval, who refided

They dismounted at their lodgings, and, having dressed and refreshed themselves with what they there sound, re-mounted their horses, and rode to the castle de la Motte, the residence of the duke, who met and received them with much joy, telling them they were welcome, for that he was very happy in seeing them. He took the lord de Coucy by the hand, and shewed him much kindness, saying,—'Fair brother, you are welcome: I rejoice to see you in Brittany: before you leave me, I will give you sine sport with hunting stags, and in hawking.' 'Dear brother and lord,' replied the lord de Coucy, 'I thank you; and I and my companions will cheerfully partake of them.'

The duke flewed them every attention, and conducted them, laughing and joking, to his apartments, where they amused themselves with much cheerfulness, as great lords are accustomed to do who have not feen each other for fome time. All four knew how to keep up a brilliant conversation as well, if not better than any lords I ever faw, not excepting the duke of Brabant, the count de Foix, nor the count de Savoy; and, in particular, the lord de Coucy shone above all others, as was acknowledged by all lords and ladies, in whatever country he had vifited, whether France, England, Germany, Lombardy, or any other places. He had feen much of the world, and had travelled to various parts, to which he was naturally inclined.

During the time these lords were in conversation, spices were brought in handsome silver comsit boxes, and sine wines in gold and silver cans. The lords partook of both, and shortly after took leave and returned to their lodgings. Thus passed the sirst day, without one word being said of the cause of their coming.

CHAP. XXVI.

WHILE HELION DE LIGNAC, AMBASSADOR FROM THE DUKE OF BERRY TO THE DUKE OF LANCASTER, IS NEGOTIATING THE MARRIAGE WITH HIS DAUGHTER, THE KING OF CASTILLE SENDS AMBASSADORS PRIVATELY TO BREAK IT OFF, AND TO DEMAND THE LADY IN MARRIAGE FOR HIS SON.—HELION DE LIGNAC IS SENT AWAY, THE DAY OF THEIR ARRIVAL, WITH SOME TRUCES RESPECTING THE FRONTIERS OF AQUITAINE.

WE will now return to fir Helion de Lignac, who had been fent by the duke of Berry to the duke of Lancaster. The knight arrived safely at Bayonne, and, having dismounted at his inn, made himself ready to wait on the duke, who had already been informed of his arrival, and, as a mark of honour, had sent two of his knights to visit him at his hôtel, and to conduct him to him.

Sir Helion, on being introduced to the duke, faluted him very profoundly, as was proper, and he knew well how to acquit himself. The duke received him most honourably, raised him up in his arms, and took him by the hand to lead him into an apartment, for they had met in the hall. Helion then gave him the letters he had been charged with from the duke of Berry. The duke, having opened and read them, advanced towards fir Helion, who declared the bufiness he had been fent on. The duke very courteoufly replied, and faid to fir Helion, he was welcome; that the matter he was come to treat on was of fuch importance, it was necessary he should deliberate with his council thereon, and that he could not instantly give him a decided answer.

Sir Helion de Lignac remained at Bayonne with the duke of Lancaster and his knights upwards of a month, and was treated most kindly by words and otherwise, and made to understand that the duke was not unwilling to accept of the duke of Berry's proposals; but this was not the fact, for all these sine speeches and delays were sictions, and solely used to give more publicity to what was going forward, more especially that it should be known in the kingdom of Castille, for there his affections were placed.

The duke of Lancaster said to sir Helion, that if his cousin of Berry married his daughter, he must unite all his force with him to wage war on his adversary of Castille, that his daughter's inheritance might be recovered. Sir Helion, in reply, said,—

' My lord, I am not charged to fay any thing refpecting this matter: you will, before my departure, write down what you expect, and I will carry it to the duke of Berry, whose affection is, I know, so strong towards you, that he will enter into all reasonable alliances you may propose.' 'We wish for nothing more,' faid the duke. Things remained in this state during the time of fir Helion's residence at Bayonne, where he was gaily entertained according to the orders the duke had given.

In the mean while, news of this intended marriage was every where fpread abroad; and, in particular, it was carried to the court of king John of Castille by those who said, - Do you know what is going forwards? There are important treaties negotiating with the dukes of Berry and Lancafter, for a match between the duke of Berry and the lady Catherine; and, if this be concluded, as there feems every probability, it will not be done without strong alliances being made between them. The duke of Berry has at this moment great power: he is the elder uncle of the king of France, and takes the lead in the government of that country. He will fucceed in whatever he may propose, as to peace or long truces with England: and, on the other hand, the duke of Lancaster stands in the fame relation to the king of England, is wife and of great power; and, as it should feem, the English are tired of war. If therefore, by means of this connection with France, a firm peace should be established with England, we shall have the war to fupport alone; for the duke of Lancaster will not give up tamely his claims on Castille, but, on the contrary, infift on establishing them, as his daughter's lawful inheritance and dower. We shall thus have war with France and England.'

Those most in the confidence of the king of Castille faid to him, - 'Sire, have you heard the rumours that are abroad? You had never fuch need of good advice as at this moment. The dangers from the duke of Lancaster are thicker than ever, and the blaft comes from France.' 'How!' replied the king: 'what do you mean?' 'In the name of God, fir, the report is every where current, that the duke of Berry is to marry the duke of Lancaster's daughter, and you may suppose this will not be done without great alliances being made between them; and you may in future fuffer as much from the French as you have lately gained by them.'

The king, on hearing this, was very penfive, for he knew what they had faid was true. He demanded advice from those who had ever been attached to him, how, in fuch a circumstance, he ought to act, and they gave him loyal and good counfel, as I will relate.

You have before heard, in this history, how king Henry of Castille had made his peace with the king of Arragon, on condition that his fon John, the present king of Castille, married his daughter. This marriage brought peace to the two countries. King John had one fon by this lady, who shortly after died; and then, by the advice of his council, he married again with the lady Beatrice, daughter to the king of Portugal. The fon, by the princess of Arragon, was a promising youth, though very young.

The council of Castille, in reply to the king's demand, faid, - Sire, we can only fee one remedy to avert the evils that may be confequent to this marriage with the duke of Berry.' 'What is it?' asked the king. 'It is the infant don Henry your fon, who is alone capable of preventing this match; for we are perfuaded, that if the duke and duchefs of Lancaster were informed you were willing to unite him with the lady Catherine, they would prefer him to the duke of Berry.' 'In God's name,' answered the king, 'you fay well, and I will instantly set about it; for our subjects will be quite fatisfied, that by fuch a marriage they will have peace with England on fea and land. Now, confider of the most proper persons to send to treat with the duke of Lancaster.'

Sire, it is necessary you should, in this matter, employ those of the greatest prudence and fagacity; and that it be treated with the utmost secrecy, lest you incur the hatred of the king of France. Great jealousies are now abroad, and persons are more eager to report scandal than good actions, for evil reports are sooner made public than others. When it shall be told to the court of France that you are in treaty with the duke of Lancaster, they will wish to know the subject and the particulars, lest it may prejudice the strong alliance the late king, your father, of worthy memory, entered into with them, and on which account the French have affisted you in your wars. You must, therefore, send to the duke of Lancaster wise and discreet persons, that the matter may be secretly treated, and kept private until all things be completely settled.'

'What you have faid is right,' replied the king: now name those whom you think capable of accomplishing the matter.'

'Sire,' faid they, 'we will fend your confessor, father Fernando de Torre, and the bishop of Geghene*, who was confessor to the late king, and Peter Gardelempos, who is a great orator.' Be it so, then,' answered the king: 'I confent. Let them be sent for, and instructed what they are to say, and how to act; for formerly, when there was a treaty of peace in agitation, they were not listened to by the duke of Lancaster, who insisted, as a preliminary, that I should lay down my crown, and this I will never do.'

The three above-mentioned persons were summoned to Burgos, where the king resided, and told from him on what object they were to be sent to Bayonne, to treat with the duke of Lancaster. They professed themselves willing to undertake it to the best of their abilities, and set out on their journey with sew attendants, not like to ambassadors going to form alliances, for they were not certain what success they should have. On entering Navarre, they made for Pampeluna, the residence of the king, who had married the king of Castille's sister.

She entertained them kindly, but they did not difcover to her, nor to the king, the cause of their journey. They passed over the mountains of Pampeluna and Roncesvalles, through the country of the Basques, and arrived at the good town of Bayonne.

At the time of their arrival, fir Helion de Lignac was still there, but made no long stay afterwards; for father Fernando, the king of Castille's confessor, waited privately on the duke of Lancaster, as better acquainted with him than the others, and gave him to understand the cause of their coming, and by whom they were sent.

The duke, on hearing this, opened his ears, for the intelligence was highly agreeable to him, and bade father Fernando a hearty welcome. This fame day he gave sir Helion de Lignac leave to depart; and it feems to me that the duke confented to a truce for those who were carrying on the war under his name in the feneschalships of Aquitaine, Bigorre, Toulouse and other places, comprehending all within the river Loire, but not beyond it, to last until the first day of May 1389. This truce had been requested by the duke of Berry, that his people might pass and repass from him to the duke of Lancaster with greater security; for those of Mortagne fur mer, Bouteville, and the garrifons in Quercy, Perigord, and on the Garonne, were very cruel, fparing none, and acknowledging no lord. It was to keep these people in better order that the duke of Berry had folicited a truce, which was well observed.

Sir Helion de Lignac left the duke of Lancaster on terms of the strongest affection, and he seemed sensible things were in the train he wished them, for the duke seemed very well satisfied with what the duke of Berry had offered. He had indeed declared, that he never could marry his daughter in France without the consent of his nephew the king of England and the english council; but matters were now so far advanced, he seemed to think there would not be any great difficulty to obtain them. On these assurances, fir Helion returned to France, delivered letters from the duke of Lancaster to the duke of Berry, and related to him all that had passed; with which he was much satisfied.

We will now speak of the ambassadors from Castille. These were indeed cordially listened to by the duke and duches, for their hearts were wrapped up in their hopes of regaining the crown for themselves or their child. They were very kindly received on their introduction at the castle by the duke and duches, to whom they delivered their credential letters, and explained the object of their mission. They sirst proposed a treaty of peace with Castille, which the father-confessor discoursed much on, in the apartment of the duke, where only the duches was present, who interpreted to the duke what he did not understand, as she had in her youth been educated in Castille, and understood the language persectly well.

The duke of Lancaster, at this first interview, did not discover his real sentiments, although he entertained them well, but faid it would be difficult to exchange fuch hatred for peace, and to establish it with one whom they wanted to disinherit, and that it was not his intention to relinquish his claim to the crown of Castille. The friar and bishop replied, 'that there was one means of reconciling his right and the right of their lord and king; and, my lord, we have found it.' 'What is it?' faid the duke. 'Sir, you have by your lady a beautiful daughter, of an age to marry, and our lord of Castille has a handsome and young son: if an union between those two could be brought about, the kingdom of Castille would have peace for ever; for what you claim will fall where it ought, to your own heir, who is the lineal defcendant from our kings of Castille; and all the fatigues you have undergone in this war must have been for the ultimate fuccession of this young lady.'

N 2 enter-

'That is true,' replied the duke; 'but I must have my expenses reimbursed, for I would have you know that my expedition to Castille has cost England and me upwards of five hundred thousand francs. I should like, therefore, to hear what you say of repayment.' 'My lord,' said the confessor, if what we have proposed shall be agreeable to you, we will manage all other things to your persect satisfaction.'

'Your coming hither,' replied the duke, 'has given us pleafure; and I shall certainly marry my daughter, before I return to England, to Castille or France, as I have had proposals from thence; but matters like these are of such importance, that an answer cannot be given at the first overture.—With regard to my daughter, whom I consider as the rightful heires of Castille, I would be well acquainted with him who should marry her.' That is but reasonable, my lord,' faid the confessor.

Thus, as I have related, were the proposals of marriage made from France and Castille, to the duke of Lancaster, for the marriage of his daughter. They were both well received, refusals made to neither, and the ambassadors well entertained. The marriage, however, with Castille was more agreeable to the duke and duchess, because their daughter would in due time become queen of Castille.

We will now leave the duke of Lancaster, and return to the affairs of Brittany.

CHAP. XXVII.

THE DUKES OF BERRY AND BURGUNDY LEAVE PARTS FOR BLOIS, TO HOLD A CONFERENCE WITH THE DUKE OF BRITTANY, WHO MEETS THEM THERE.

—THEY PERSUADE HIM, AGAINST HIS INCLINATION, TO COME TO PARIS.

THE duke of Brittany, as I have said, received the french knights with much kindness, more particularly the lord de Coucy, whom he had been desirous to see. I was informed at the time, the lord de Coucy was the most instrumental in making the duke change his mind: not but that sir John de Vienne and the lord de la Riviere exerted themselves to the same purpose, but all princes, when they are entreated, will naturally incline to some persons more than others.

The duke of Brittany confented, with great difficulty, to meet the dukes of Berry and Burgundy at Blois: after many fair speeches, he said he would go thither, but not one step farther. The lord de Coucy replied, that they asked nothing more, unless it should be perfectly agreeable to him. These three lords staid with the duke of Brittany I know not how many days, and then returned to the dukes of Berry and Burgundy to tell them their success.

Upon this, the two dukes made preparations for going to meet the duke of Brittany at Blois, and fent before all purveyances fuitable to their rank. The duke of Berry arrived first at the castle, where he was kindly received by the countess of Blois, his son and her daughter, as was becoming him and them.

Count Guy de Blois was not at this time in the country, but at Châtel Regnaud, and, as the countefs and her children were at home, he paid no attention to the arrival of the duke of Berry. The duke of Burgundy came in a grand ftyle, accompanied by his fon-in-law, lord William of Hainault, count d'Ostrevant, and his fon John of Burgundy, called count de Nevers. The duke was also lodged in the castle, and held there his court.

The duke of Brittany came last, but with no great array, attended only by those of his household, in number about three hundred horse; for it was his intention to return to his own country as soon as these conferences should be over. Such, however, were not the intentions of the other dukes; for they said, whether he would or not they would force him to come to Paris. The duke of Brittany was lodged at the house of a canon of St. Sauveur, within the castle; but his attendants, with those of the other lords, were quartered in the town. These princes kept their state in the castle, which is large, and one of the handsomest in the kingdom of France.

Conferences were held between the three dukes; and those of France gave handsome entertainments to the duke of Brittany, shewing him much affection, and repeatedly thanking him for coming to Blois. The duke dissembled as well as he could, and faid, that indeed it was from his love to them he had undertaken such a journey, for that he was very unwell. In the course of their conversations, they told the duke of Brittany, that since he had come so far, he would have done nothing if he did not continue his journey to Paris, for the king was very anxious to see him. The duke made every excuse for not complying with this proposal, saying, his health was too bad to go so far; that he had not brought any attendants with him, but simply those of his household, meaning to return home directly.

They kindly answered, that, begging his pardon, it would not be decorous for him to visit his lord paramount with too large a company; that if he were too ill to ride, they were provided with litters and cars that should be at his service; and that he was bound to pay his homage to the king, which he had never yet done.

The duke of Brittany, in excuse, said, that when the king should be of age, and take the reins of government, he would come to Paris, or to any other place whither he might order him, to perform his homage, for he was bounden so to do. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy replied, that he was of sufficient age and understanding to receive homage; and that every lord of France, and all who held siefs under the crown, excepting himself, had done their homage, for the king was now in his twenty-first year. The duke of Brittany, finding his excuses of no avail, faid, - Should I go to Paris, it will be much against my inclination, and very prejudicial to my interests; for, when there, I shali meet sir Oliver de Clisson, whom I hate, and we can never cordially love each other after what has passed: he will make me bitter and injurious reproaches, and confider what may be the confequences.' 'Oh no,' answered the two dukes, but in particular the duke of Burgundy, 'fair coufin, have no fear from that quarter; for we folemnly fwear to you, that neither the constable nor John of Brittany, unless you wish it, shall see or speak with you: of this be affured: but you shall see the king, who is anxious for it, and the barons and knights of France, who will make you good cheer; and when you have completed the object of your journey, you shall return home without hindrance or hurt.'

Why should I make a long story? The duke of Brittany was so sweetly entreated, that he consented to go to Paris; but he insisted that he should never see the constable of France nor John of Brittany, and that they should never be in the same company with him. The two dukes solemnly pledged themselves to all his requests; and on their faith he engaged to set out for Paris. They remained sive or six days in the castle of Blois, and alternately gave grand entertainments to each other, the countess and her children.

Every thing having been fo fettled, the two dukes took leave of the duke of Brittany and returned turned to Paris; but the lord William of Hainault did not accompany his father-in-law, the duke of Burgundy. He attended the countefs of Blois and her family to châtel Regnaud, to vifit count Guy de Blois, where he was kindly received and entertained for three days, when he took leave of them and went to Paris, by way of Chateau-dun* and Bonneval†.

CHAP. XXVIII.

LEWIS OF ANJOU, SON TO THE LATE DUKE OF ANJOU, UNCLE TO KING CHARLES VI. MAKES HIS PUBLIC ENTRY INTO PARIS AS KING OF SICILY.—THE DUKE OF BRITTANY COMES THERE SHORTLY AFTER.—THOMAS HAPURGAN, AN ENGLISHMAN, AND JOHN DES BARRES, A FRENCHMAN, PERFORM A DEED OF ARMS BEFORE THE KING OF FRANCE AT MONTEREAU SUR YONNE;

THE duke of Brittany went to Beaugency, on the Loire, where he made his preparations for going to Paris. But before he came thither, there of the late duke of Anjou, who had borne the title of king of those countries, as well as of Naples. She had brought with her her young fon Lewis, who throughout France was acknowledged as king of Naples, and was likewise accompanied by her brother, John of Brittany.

* Chateau-dun, an ancient town in Beauce, diocefe of Blois, twelve leagues from Chartres, thirty-four from Paris.

† Bonneval, a town in Beauce, four leagues from Chateau-dun.

‡ Montereau fur Yonne, a town in Brie, seven leagues from Melun, twenty and a half from Paris.

Before she entered Paris, she signified to her brothers, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, her arrival, with her son Lewis, their nephew, and defired to know whether he should make his entry as king, or simply as duke of Anjou. The two dukes, having considered the matter, sent for answer, that they desired he would make his entry as king of Naples, Sicily and Jerusalem, although he was not as yet in the possession of these kingdoms; for they would assist him, and prevail on the king of France to do the same, so effectually, that he should recover those territories, and peaceably possess them as his right, and what they had most facredly promised to perform to their late brother the king of Naples.

The lady, upon this, made preparations accordingly; and, having entered Paris, her fon passed in grand cavalcade, through the street of St. James, to his hôtel in the Grêve, with kingly state, accompanied by numbers of dukes, counts and prelates. The queen and her son, having established themselves there, waited on the king, who resided at the castle of the Louvre, expecting the duke of Brittany.

The duke of Brittany, on his approach to Paris, stopped

flopped one night at Bourg la Reine, previous to his entry which he made on the morrow. This was great news for the Parifians, on account of the late events of the arrest and imprisonment of the constable, and the fruitless embassies that had been fent to fummon him: his late conduct and his coming now as it were, of his own free will, were variously spoken of. It was on a Sunday, the vigil of St. John Baptist's feast, in the year 1388, at ten o'clock in the morning. The duke of Brittany entered Paris by the gate de l'Enfer*, and, passing the whole length of the rue de la Harpe, crossed the pont de Saint Michel, and came in front of the palace. He was handfomely accompanied by numbers of barons and knights; among whom was the lord William of Hainault, count d'Ostrevant: his brother-in-law John of Burgundy, and the lord William de Namur rode before him.

When he arrived at the castle of the Louvre, he dismounted, and, as he passed through Paris, was much stared at by the common people.

The duke entered the gate of the Louvre well prepared what to fay, and how to act. He was preceded by the lord de Coucy, the count de Savoye, fir John de Vienne, fir Guy de la Trimouille, fir John de Beuil, the count de Meaux, fir Reginald de Roye and fir John des Barres: nearer to him, on each fide, were the lord William de Namur, John of Burgundy and the count d'Ostrevant: behind him were, the lord de Montfort in Brittany, and the lord de Malestroit, his relation and minister.

* De l'Enfer. It is now the gate of Saint Michel. For more particulars, see Sauval, Antiquités de Paris, tom. i. p. 36.

There was a great crowd in the apartment, which was not only fmall, but the table was fpread in it for the king's dinner, who was standing before it with his three uncles of Berry, Burgundy and Bourbon. The moment the duke of Brittany entered the room, way was made for him, and an opening formed to the king, by the lords falling on each fide. When in the prefence, he dropped on one knee, but speedily arose and advanced about ten or twelve paces, when he again kneeled: on rifing, he came close to the king, kneeled the third time, and faluted him bare-headed, faying, 'My lord, I am come to fee you: may God preferve you!' 'Many thanks,' replied the king. 'I was anxious for your coming: we will fee and converse with you at our leifure.' On which he took him by the hand, and raifed him up. When the duke had rifen, he bowed to all the princes prefent, one after the other, and then stood opposite to the king without faying a word; but the king never took his eyes off him.

A fignal was made to the masters of the household to bring water, when the king washed, and the duke of Brittany held the bason and towel.

When the king was feated, the duke took leave of him and of his uncles. The lord de Coucy, the lord de Saint Pol, and other great barons conducted ducted him to the court where his horses waited, and, having mounted, he returned with his attendants the way they had come, through the street de la Harpe, and dismounted at his hôtel. None of those who had attended him remained, excepting such as had accompanied him from Brittany to Paris.

The duke of Brittany had frequent conferences with the king of France and his uncles to their mutual fatisfaction; and they religiously kept the promife they had made him, for he never faw, during his stay at Paris, John of Brittany nor the constable of France. When affairs were in fo good a train that they had not reason to be suspicious of the duke of Brittany, (for, if he had not confented to every thing the king and his council wished, they would never have suffered him to escape from their hands, as they now had him in Paris,) they thought it time to prepare for the expedition to Gueldres, for which the king was impatient, to punish the duke of Gueldres for the infolent and rude challenge he had fent him; which, the more it was confidered, was the lefs to be borne.

The lord de Coucy was therefore ordered into the country, near Rheims and Châlons in Champagne, to mark out the line of march for the king and his army, and to excite the knights and squires of Bar and Lorraine to join him. He was in no way to introduce the king's name, but to engage them for himself, as if preparing for an expedition into Austria. Upon this, the lord de Coucy left Paris.

Paris, and went to Châlons, where he resided about one month, and retained knights and squires from all parts in Bar, Lorraine, Champagne and in the Rethelois.

The king of France, after several conferences with the duke of Brittany, left Paris, though the duke's pleadings in his courts were not near concluded; for their proceedings, when they choose, are very tedious, and they make the suitors spend much money without any great advances in their suits.

The king went to Montereau fur Yonne, on the borders of Brie and the Gatinois, where he held his court, and frequently amused himself with hunting stags and other animals in the adjacent forests.

During the refidence of the king at Montereau, a deed of arms was there performed between an english knight attached to the duke of Ireland, called fir Thomas Hapurgan, and fir John des Barres. This duel had made a great noise throughout France, and in other countries; and it was to be fought with five courses of the lance on horseback, five thrusts with swords, the same number of strokes with daggers and battle-axes; and, should their armour fail, they were to be supplied anew, until it were perfect.

The knights, being well armed, mounted their courfers to perform their duel, in the presence of the king, his barons and knights, and a great concourse of people. They tilted on horseback four courses very stiffly, and kept their seats well. It was then the custom, I believe, to lace on the helmets with a slight thong, that they might not make too great resistance to the blow of the lance. At the sifth course, John des Barres struck his opponent so violent a blow on the shield, that he knocked him over the crupper of his horse to the ground. Sir Thomas was stupisted by the fall, and it was with much difficulty he could be raised: however, he recovered well enough to perform his other courses with the different arms, to the satisfaction of the king and his lords.

CHAP. XXIX.

PERROT LE BEARNOIS TAKES THE FIELD BY COM-MAND OF THE EARL OF ARUNDEL, WHO LANDS HIS FORCES AT MARANS*, NEAR LA ROCHELLE.

HAVE been fome time filent respecting the expedition that was at sea under the command of the earl of Arundel: it is now necessary I should speak of it. You have before heard the cause of its being sent from England, and the treaties that were made between the king and the duke of Brittany. This sleet had remained the whole season on the coasts of Brittany and Normandy, except when driven off by storms, but it always returned to its station. There were in this sleet some light vessels called Balleniers, which are much used by corfairs; for, as they draw little water, they can the easier approach the shores. This sleet had lain at anchor upwards of a month off the island of Brehat, whence it had got provision. As it was not far from la Roche-derrien, they heard that the duke of Brittany was gone to Blois, to meet the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, who had held such fair language as persuaded him to go to Paris, where he had been so well received by the king, as to prevent him from leaving that place until every thing had been satisfactorily settled.

* Marans, a town in Aunis, four leagues from la Rochelle.

The earl of Arundel was much cast down when he heard the above, and called a council of his principal officers, to consider how they were to employ their force during the remainder of the seafon. In this council they resolved to fail for la Rochelle and make war on that country; for, though they had not any castles in those parts, yet they were in sufficient numbers to withstand the force Saintonge or Poitou could send against them. They intended likewise to make their situation known to their friends in Limousin and Auvergne, by some person in their sleet that was acquainted with the country, whom they would land on the coast of Brittany.

The truces which fir Helion de Lignac had obtained from the duke of Lancaster had not yet staken effect. They were to commence on the first of August, and the knight was at this time going or returning, I know not which, to or from the duke of Lancaster at Bayonne.

Vol. IX. O of

It fell out just as the earl of Arundel and the english barons wished; for they found out a man from lower Brittany, who ferved under fir William Helimon, then on board, who came from near Vannes, and understood four languages perfectly well, that of lower Brittany, English, Spanish and French. Before they landed him on the fand, they gave him the following orders: 'Thou wilt go by all the bye-roads in this country, which thou fayest thou art acquainted with, until thou shalt come to Chaluçet*. Thou wilt falute Perrot le Béarnois from us, and tell him, that we defire he will take the field, with as many other garrifons of our party as he can, and make war on France under our commission. Thou shalt not carry any letters for fear thou mightest be stopped and searched. Say, if thou findest thyself in danger, that thou belongest to a wine-merchant of la Rochelle, who had fent thee with some commissions, and thou wilt pass every where. Tell Perrot to give inflant alarm to Berry, Auvergne and Limoufin, by taking the field; for we will disembark near la Rochelle, and make fuch a war that he shall foon hear of us.

The Breton faid, he would faithfully deliver the message, unless he were stopped on the road. On being landed, as he knew well the country of Brittany, he avoided all great towns, and, passing safely through Poitou and Limousin, arrived at Chaluçet, of which Perrot le Béarnois was governor. On coming to the barriers, having made acquaintance with the garrison, they allowed him to enter, after examining him at the gates, and led him to Perrot, to whom he punctually delivered the message, to the great joy of the governor, who had been long impatient to hear some news of the sleet, and now he had it quite fresh. He said to the Breton,—

<sup>4</sup> Chaluçet, a town in Limouan, near Pierre-buffiere.

Thou art welcome: my companions and myself are very eager to take the field, which we will now speedily do, and then act as we are ordered.

Perrot le Béarnois instantly sent to the governors of Carlat, the bourg de Compane, to Olim Barbe, captain of Ouzach, to Amerigot Marcel, captain of Aloife, near Saint Flour, and to the captains of the other forts in Auvergne and Limousin, to say he was about to take the field, as the feafon was now favourable, and defiring they would join him, after having left garrisons in their forts strong enough to prevent any accident during their abfence. These companions had as great a defire to take the field as Perrot le Béarnois; for they could only enrich themselves by the losses of others, and, making their preparations in hafte, came to Chalucet, where the general affembly had been fixed. They amounted to full four hundred lances, and thought themselves in sufficient strength for any gallant enterprife, and that there was not a lord in the country able to withstand them; for fir William de Lignac and Bonne-lance would not, on their account, break up the fiege of Ventadour.

O 2 liam

Being masters of the country, they began their march through Auvergne, towards Berry, because they knew the duke was with the king at Montereau sur Yonne. We will, for a while, leave Perrot le Béarnois, and speak of the earl of Arundel and his sleet, and what they did on quitting the coast of Brittany.

When they weighed anchor, the weather was fo fine and beautiful, they hoisted every fail, and advanced as it pleased God. It was a magnificent fight to view this fleet of fix fcore veffels, whose streamers, emblazoned with the arms of the different lords, were glittering in the fun, and fluttering with the wind. They floated as it were on a fea that feemed proud to bear them, and which might be compared to a vigorous courfer, who, after being long confined in the stable, gains its liberty to bound over the plains; for thus did the fea, gently ruffled by the wind, fwell on with a burden it was lustily bearing, and, figuratively speaking, it may be supposed to fay,- I delight in carrying you, and will do fo without danger, until you be arrived in a fafe harbour.'

The fleet coasted Saintonge and Poitou, and cast anchor off Marans, near la Rochelle. Some of the most adventurous, to the amount of two hundred, observing the tide was flowing, entered their barges, and sailed up the river to the town of Marans. The watch on the castle had noticed the english sleet anchoring, and the barges ascending the river with the tide, and had founded his horn frequently, to alarm the townsmen, that they might save all they could of their property. The inhabitants, of both sexes, carried their most valuable things to the castle for safety; and it was well they did so, or they would have been lost. While the English were landing, they discontinued saving their property, to take care of their lives.

The English, on entering the town, began to pillage it, for this had been the object of their coming, but they only found empty coffers: their contents had been carried to the castle. They discovered, however, plenty of corn, wine and falted provisions: for there were upwards of four hundred tons of wine in the town. They resolved to remain to guard this provision, which came very opportunely to them; for, should they depart, they imagined the greater part would be carried away by the French, up the river, to Fontenay le Cointe. They remained this night in the place, having arrived there only about vespers, and gave themselves full liberty, fending, however, to inform their companions of their fituation, and the reason why they did not return.

The earl of Arundel and the other lords were fatisfied, and faid they had acted right. On the morrow, when the tide began to flow, the smaller veffels weighed anchor, and in them were embarked the armour and other necessaries from the large ships that, from their size, could not enter the river. There were left in them one hundred men at arms and two hundred archers to guard them, as they they lay at anchor off the mouth of the river. When this had been done, they failed for Marans, and landed at their leifure, for none came to oppose them, and fixed their quarters between Marans and la Rochelle, which is but four short leagues distant. The alarm was soon spread over the country that the English had landed at Marans, to the amount of sour hundred combatants, including archers. The towns and castles in the low country were much frightened, and the villagers instantly sled to the neighbouring forests for protection.

CHAP. XXX.

THE ROCHELLERS SKIRMISH WITH THE ENGLISH NEAR MARANS.—THE ENGLISH, AFTER PILLAGING THE COUNTRY ROUND, RETIRE WITH THEIR BOOTY TO THEIR FLEET.—PERROT LE BEARNOIS DOES THE SAME TO HIS FORT, WITH A GREAT DEAL OF PLUNDER.

IF the English had had horses, they would have much harassed the country round la Rochelle; for it was void of men at arms, at least such as could have opposed them successfully. True it is, that the lords de Partenay, de Pons, de Linieres, de Tannaybouton, sir Geossry d'Argenton, the lord de Montendre, sir Aimery de Rochechouart, the viscount de Thouars, and many other knights and fquires of Poitou and Saintonge, were in the country, but each was in his own castle; for they had not any suspicions of the English coming to invade them.

Had they been fo fortunate as to obtain notice of their intentions, they would have been prepared to receive them, but it was not fo; and the furprife was fo great, that all were frightened, and impatient to fave what they could. The farmers began to hasten their harvest of corn, for it was the beginning of August. Add to this, there was not then in the country any person to take the lead. The lieutenant of Poitou, the duke of Berry, was at Montereau: the fénéfchal of Poitou was just gone to Paris: the fénéfchal of Saintonge was from home: the fénéschal of la Rochelle, sir Helion de Lignac, was at Bayonne, on the business of the dake of Berry, by which the country was left defenceless; for, from want of heads, their courage failed, and without that nothing effectual can be done.

The country was much alarmed for two causes: they had the english army and sleet on one side, and rumour had already informed them that Perrot le Béarnois was on his march, with more than sisteen hundred combatants, and had already entered Berry. They knew not what measures to adopt, except that of placing their wealth in safety; for it was said these two armies were to form a junction in Saintonge or Poitou, as was the intention of many.

There were indeed, at the time the English landed landed at Marans, two gallant knights from Beauce in the town of la Rochelle, fir Peter de Jouy and the lord Taillepié, whom fir Helion de Lignac had placed there for its defence, when he fet out to meet the duke of Berry at Paris. They had acquitted themselves ably; and on hearing that the armament under the earl of Arundel, which had been much talked of all the fummer, had difembarked at Marans, they told the mayor and the principal citizens, for it is a populous place, that it would be right to beat up the english quarters, and added,- 'We hear they have established themfelves at Marans, and lay the furrounding country under contribution: we two are determined to bid them welcome, and they shall pay us, or we will repay them for what they have done. Great blame and reproaches will fall on us, to whom has been committed the government of this town and country, if we fuffer them quietly to fix their quarters there. There is one thing much in our favour: they have not any horses, and are for the most part failors, whilst we are all well mounted. We will fend our cross-bows before us, to awaken them with a fhower of arrows; and, when they have made their attack, they will return homeward: the English will foon be on foot, and we will then charge them, and, by being on horseback, may do them great mischief.

Those who heard this speech approved of it, and instantly assembled a body of twelve hundred cross bows and varlets, including all forts. At the first dawn of day, they were all prepared, and tet out from la Rochelle at a good pace, to beat up the quarters of the English. During this, the horse got ready, and they were about three hundred, for many knights and squires had hastened to la Rochelle on the first intelligence of the English having landed at Marans. They left the town under the command of the two knights before named.

Had the English fortunately had any suspicion of this attack from the Rochellers, and had formed an ambuscade of two hundred archers and one hundred men at arms, not one would ever have returned to la Rochelle.

When the cross-bowmen arrived at the english quarters, it was very early morn; and lucky it was for them that the guard, who had watched all night, was retired at fun-rise. The cross-bowmen began to shoot their bolts and arrows, which passed through the huts made of boughs and leaves, to the great surprise of the English who were assep within side on straw. Many were wounded before they discovered they were attacked by the French. When they had made each about six shots, they retreated, according to their orders, and the men at arms advanced on horseback amidst the english huts.

Knights and squires speedily left their lodgings, and drew up together; and the french captains, seeing they were preparing themselves in earnest to take the field, made after their cross-bows and infantry, who were hastening homeward, for they were much asraid of the english arrows. Thus hurrying, hurrying, and in difmay, were the Rochellers purfued, though the horse guarded the rear, to the town of la Rochelle. The earl of Arundel with upwards of four hundred men at arms was closely following, each man with his lance in his hand or on his shoulder. There was much crowding and difficulty to pass the gates; and sir Peter de Jouy and the lord Taillepié fought like valiant heroes in defending their men, keeping still on their rear, until they were come to the barriers. They were fo hard preffed by the English, who were at their heels, they ran a great hazard of being flain or made prisoners; for the attack was the more vigorous against them as it was visible they were the commanders. Sir Peter de Jouy had his courfer killed under him, and was with great difficulty dragged within the barriers. Sir Peter Taillepié was pierced through the thigh with a lance, and hit by an arrow on the helmet which entered his head, and his good horse fell dead under him at the gate.

There was much flaughter made on the Rochellers re-entering the town: upwards of forty dead and wounded lay at the gates. The inhabitants had mounted the battlements, and fired fo many cannons and bombards that the English dared not approach nearer.

Thus ended this skirmish between the English and Rochellers. As it was near noon, the earl of Arundel had sounded the retreat, when the men at arms and archers retired in handsome array to their quarters, where they disarmed and refreshed themselves.

themselves. They had wherewithal, having been amply provided with wines and meat from the surrounding country.

The english lords remained at Marans for fifteen days, waiting for deeds of arms and adventures; but the Rochellers never ventured again to come near them, for they had found to their cost how valiantly they had defended themselves. two commanders were also wounded, which induced the others to wish for peace. The earl of Arundel, indeed, had fent four times parties to overrun the country round la Rochelle, and as far as Thouars, who did much mischief and terrified the inhabitants. They would have done more had they had horses; but only a few were mounted on what they could find in the country, and thefe were fcarce, for no fooner was the invafion known than all the inhabitants of the flat country fled with their stock and wealth to the great towns, and there shut themselves up.

When the English had remained near la Rochelle for fifteen days, without seeing any attempt made to oppose them, and the wind became fair, they embarked a great quantity of wine and fresh meat they had taken, and, having weighed anchor, put to sea. This same day, they met twelve ships from Bayonne, on their voyage to England with gascony wines and other merchandise. They sailed together for some time, being much rejoiced at this meeting, for they were well acquainted, and the Bayonnois gave the earl of Arundel two pipes of wine for the love they bore him. The Bayonnois then separated to continue their voyage, and the fleet kept cruifing about in search of adventures.

While this armament was lying before Marans, Perrot le Béarnois and his companions had taken the field, and, having passed Limousin, had entered Berry. He had with him four hundred spears and as many pillagers, and carried off in one day all the merchandife that was in the town of le Blanc* in Berry, and gained great wealth and many prifoners, for it was fair-day. He then marched to Sellest, which he plundered. Thus did Perrot le Béarnois maintain himfelf. He advanced far into the interior of the country, doing great mischief wherever he went, for none ventured to oppose him; and all parts were alarmed, even as far as the county of Blois and the Touraine, for they were uncertain whither these two armies would march Some imagined they would unite; but it was not fo, for the earl of Arundel had embarked again, as I have mentioned, and Perrot with his companions returned to their strong holds.

When they had completely plundered the country, they thought it would be more fafe for them to retire to their castles and secure their gains. They took, in consequence, the roads through Limousin and Auvergne to their forts; and nothing more was done, as to deeds of arms, in these two provinces the remainder of the feason, for the truce that had been agreed to last until the ensuing month of May now took place.

* Le Blanc,—in the generality of Bourges, 17 leagues from Politiers, nine from Argenton.

† Selles, or Celles, three leagues from St. Aignan, ten from Blois.

The fiege of Ventadour by fir William de Lignac, fir John Bonne-lance, and fir John le Bouteiller still continued; for Geoffry Tête-noir was fo presumptuous as to pay not the least attention to the truce, nor to the besiegers, depending on the strength of his castle.

We will now, for variety, return to the affairs of Brabant and Gueldres.

CHAP. XXXI.

THE BRABANTERS PRESS GRAVE HARD BY THEIR SIEGE.—THE GUELDRIANS BURN A BRIDGE THE BRABANTERS HAD THROWN OVER THE MEUSE, TO ENTER GUELDRES.

YOU have before read how anxious the duchefs of Brabant was to make war on the duke of Gueldres, and to befiege Grave. There was a great force of knights and fquires from the principal towns before it, who declared their intentions were not to depart until they had gained possession of it; and the duchefs, to show how interested she was in the matter, had come to reside at Bois le Duc, four leagues distant from it.

The befieging army was plentifully supplied with all things that came thither by fea, or down the Meufe, from the rich country of Brabant, fo that the fiege was long continued; and the Brabanters had many large machines which threw into the town stones of such weight as to do much damage wherever they fell. In addition, they slung into the town all the dead carrion of the army to empoison the inhabitants by the slink. This was forely felt by them, for the weather was hot, and the air too calm to carry off these villanous smells.

At times, many of the knights and fquires of Brabant came to skirmish with the garrison at the barriers; for the duke of Gueldres had placed within the town fome gallant companions, who were not shy of shewing their courage, when occafions called for it, and the enemy advanced fo near as the barriers. The fiege lasted a long time; and the duke of Gueldres had fixed his quarters at Nimeguen; but he could neither raise the siege, nor offer combat to the Brabanters, for want of fufficient force. He had fent to England an account of his fituation, and expected for certain he should have a reinforcement from thence, but he was disappointed; for England at the time was in a very unfettled state, and new ministers had been forced on the king by his uncles and the archbishop of Canterbury. A parliament was indeed holden, about St. John Baptist's day, at the duke's request, to consider whether a body of men at arms and archers should be fent to affist the duke of Gueldres, according to treaty. Having confidered the matter fully, they would not agree to it; for it was strongly rumoured, that the king of France was affembling a large army, and it was doubtful whither he would march it, and the English imagined it was intended to attack Calais. They were also uneasy respecting the Scots on the borders, and were fearful of fending more forces out of the kingdom, as a large body of men at arms and archers were at fea, under the earl of Arundel, lest the country might be defenceless. When the council was confidering the affairs of Gueldres, fome of the lords faid, - 'Let the duke of Gueldres take care of himfelf: he is valorous enough, and in his own country, and will withstand all the Brabanters can do against him: if any thing worse befal him, he shall have assistance. He has again the Germans, his neighbours, on his fide, who formerly joined him against France.'

Such was the state of affairs in England; but those in Grave suffered much from the siege. During the time it lasted, the Brabanters resolved to throw a wooden bridge over the Meuse, that they might have an entrance into Gueldreland, overrun that country, and, by investing the town of Grave on all sides, prevent any provision from entering it; for they were numerous enough to surround it, could they gain a passage over the river. As they sinished the different parts of this bridge, they joined and placed them in their proper situations, and had made such advances, that it was within the length of a lance of the opposite shore.

You may suppose that the duke was no way ignorant of what they were about, but he gave not any interruption to their building the bridge, until it was nearly completed. He then advanced with cannons and other artillery, and attacked it fo roughly, that it was fet on fire and destroyed. Thus did the Brabanters, to their great vexation, lose all the effect of their labour. They, upon this, called a council to determine how to act.

CHAP. XXXII.

THE BRABANTERS, HAVING PASSED THROUGH RAVESTEIN*, ENTER GUELDRELAND, AND ARE DEFEATED BY THE DUKE OF GUELDRES.—THE SIEGE OF GRAVE IS RAISED IN CONSEQUENCE.

THREE short leagues from Grave lies the town of Ravestein, belonging to the lord de Bourne, who is a vassal to Brabant. At the council I mentioned, the lord de Bourne was solicited by the ministers of the duchess of Brabant, and by the knights and squires, to open his town of Ravestein for them to gain an entrance into Gueldreland, and, with part of their army, overrun it: he complied with their request.

* Ravestein,—a town of the Netherlands in dutch Brabant, and capital of a county of the same name, with an ancient and strong castle. It belongs to the elector Palatine; but the Dutch have a right to put a garrison there. It is situated on the Meuse, on the confines of Gueldreland, ten miles south-west of Nimeguen.—BROOKES' GAZETTEER.

The duke of Gueldres, I know not whether by spies or otherwise, gained information that the Brabanters intended entering his territories by the bridge of Ravestein, through the compliance of the lord de Bourne. He was much cast down when he first learnt this, as his force was not near fufficient to meet that of Brabant, which confifted of more than forty thousand men. He formed various plans how to act, and at last determined that, if the Brabanters entered his country, he would retaliate by the bridge of Grave, for he was refolved not to be shut up in any town. He consulted the lord de Ghesme, a great baron in Gueldreland, and his principal adviser, who would not at first agree to his taking the field, on account of the smallness of his numbers. 'And what must I do then?' said the duke. 'Would you have me shut myself up in one of my towns, while they are plundering and burning my country? This would be too great a lofs. I vow to God and our Lady,' added the duke, 'that I will take the field to meet my enemies, and follow the best measures I can devise that the event may be favourable.'

This plan he executed; and, on the morrow, after he had paid his devotions in the church, and made his offering at the altar of the virgin, he drank fome wine, and, mounting his horse, set out from Nimeguen He was accompanied by only three hundred spears, or indeed less, and they made straight for the place where they supposed they Vol. IX.

should find their enemies. You may from this judge of the duke's courage, although some blamed him.

When they were without the town of Nimeguen, like a valiant knight, he shouted out,— 'Forward, forward! let us, in the name of God and St. George, hasten to meet our enemy; for I had rather perish with honour in the field than die dishonourably shut up in a town.' With him were the lord de Ghesme, who commanded the expedition, and a valiant and prudent knight, called the heir of Hanseberth, the lord de Huckelem, sir Ostez, lord of Naspre, and several other knights and squires of good courage.

The fame day on which the duke of Gueldres had taken the field, the fénéfchal of Brabant had done the same at a very early hour of the morning, with a large body of knights and squires from Brabant, who were eager to enter Gueldreland, and gain there both honour and profit. Upwards of ten thousand men crossed the bridge of Ravestein; and the fénéfchal, the lord de Ligniere, the lord de Bourgueval, the lord de Gence and the rest, were much pleafed at having croffed the Meufe, and faid among themselves, they would that day ride as far as Nimeguen, and burn its mills, suburbs, and the villages that were round about; but they had shortly other news brought them by their scouts, whom they had fent forward to examine the country.

The duke of Gueldres was informed, that his enesuies, to the amount of ten thousand, were abroad, and had passed the Meuse at the bridge at Ravestein. The duke halted, on hearing this, to confider again their best mode of proceeding, for some of his companions were alarmed at the fmallness of their numbers in comparison with the enemy, who were at least thirty or forty for one. They faid, - 'How is it possible for three or four hundred lances to oppose ten or twelve thousand? it is not in our power to overthrow them, but they may very eafily flay us.' Several affembled round the duke, and advised him to retreat to Grave; but he replied, 'he would never do fo, nor confine himfelf in any town, but march to meet his enemies, for his courage told him he should defeat them; and he preferred dying with honour to living in difgrace. We will overthrow, faid he, our enemies, and gain this day infinite honour and wealth.' He then, after a short pause, added in a loud voice, 'Forward, forward! those who love me will follow me.'

This fpeech of the duke greatly encouraged his men, more especially those who had heard the whole; and they all shewed a great earnestness to combat their enemies, who were fast approaching. They tightened their armours, lowered the visors of their helmets, and re-girthed their saddles, and marched slowly in handsome array, that their horses might be fresh for the charge. Some new knights were made, and they marched in this order towards Ravestein.

The Brabanters, with great numbers of common people, had already croffed the river, when news was brought to the fénéfchal and his knights that the duke of Gueldres had taken the field, and was fo near that they must speedily see him. They were much surprised at this intelligence, and concluded that the duke must at least have had with him six times more men than he had.

P 2 the

They inflantly halted, and would have drawn themselves up in array, but had not time; for the duke of Gueldres appeared with his company full gallop, with fpears in their refts, and shouting their cry, 'Our Lady for Gueldres!' A squire of Gueldreland, called Hermaut de Morbec, deserves particular attention, from the great desire he had to exalt his name. He left the ranks of the battalion, and, fpurring his horse, was the first to assault the enemy, and at this gallant tilt unhorfed the man I know not if he were raifed from the he struck. ground, for the crowd was fo great, that when any were difmounted, unless instantly relieved, they ran great risk of being crushed to death. More than fix fcore Brabanters were unhorfed at this first charge. Great confusion and difmay, with but a poor defence, reigned among them. They were fo fuddenly attacked, (which is the way enemies should be by those who wish to conquer them,) that although they were fo numerous, and had many great lords, they were dispersed: they could never form any array, nor could the lords rally their men, nor these last join their lords. Those in the rear, hearing the noise, and seeing the clouds of dust, thought their men must have been discomsited, and that the enemy were coming to them, fo that they became panic-struck, and, turning about, fled for Ravestein

Ravestein or the Meuse. Their fright was so great, they rushed into the river, whether on horseback or on foot, without sounding the bottom or knowing if it were fordable, for they imagined the enemy was at their heels. By this self-defeat, upwards of twelve hundred perished in the river Meuse; for they leaped one on the other, without any distinction, like wild beafts.

Many great lords and barons of Brabant (whose names I shall not disclose, to save them, and their heirs from the disgrace that would attach to them) most shamefully fled from the field, and sought their safety, not by the river nor by Ravestein, but by other roads that carried them to a distance from their enemies.

This unfortunate event to the chivalry of Brabant happened between Grave and Ravestein. Great numbers were flain. All who could furrender did so instantly; and the Germans took them at ranfom very readily, for the great profit they expected to make from them. Those who had fled to Grave gave the alarm to the befieging army; for they arrived out of breath, and fo haraffed that they could fearcely fay to them, 'Retire as fast as you can, for we have been totally defeated, and nothing can fave you.' When those in camp faw their appearance and heard their report, they were fo frightened that they would not ftay to pack up any thing, nor even take down their tents and pavilions, but fet off without bidding adieu, and left every thing behind them. They were feized with fuch a panic as neither to take victual nor carriage;

but fuch as had horses leaped on them, and sied for safety to Bois le Duc, Houdan, Mont St. Gervais, Gertruydenberg or Dordrecht. Their only care was to save themselves, and sly from their enemies. Had the garrison of Grave known of this defeat of the Brabanters, they would have greatly gained by it, and killed or brought back many of the runaways. They were not made acquainted with it until late, when they sallied forth, and took possession of tents, pavilions, and warlike engines the Brabanters in their fright had left behind, which they brought at their leisure into Grave, for there were none to oppose them.

Thus was the fiege of Grave broken up, to the great loss of the Brabanters. News was spread far and near, how a handful of men had overthrown forty thousand and raised the fiege of Grave. The lord de Bourgueval and the lord de Linieres were made prisoners, with others to the amount of seventeen banners. These and the pennons you will find hung up before the image of our Lady at Nimeguen, that the perpetual remembrance of this victory may be kept up.

CHAP. XXXIII.

THE DUKE OF GUELDRES, AFTER THE DEFEAT OF THE BRABANTERS, RETURNS TO NIMEGUEN.—
ON THE NEWS OF THIS VICTORY, THE KING AND COUNCIL OF FRANCE SEND AMBASSADORS TO THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY, THE MORE SECURELY TO CARRY ON THEIR WAR AGAINST GUELDRE-LAND.

SCARCELY can I for shame perpetuate the difgraceful defeat of the Brabanters; but, as I have promised at the commencement of this history to insert nothing but what was strictly true, I must detail the unfortunate consequences of this battle. The young duke of Gueldres gained this renowned victory about Magdalen-tide, in the month of July 1388.

When the defeat and purfuit were over, which took up about two hours time, and the field cleared, the Gueldrians collected together, and greatly rejoiced, as indeed they had cause, at the fortunate success of the day, for they had made many more prisoners than they were in number themselves. The heralds were ordered by them to examine the dead, and report who had been slain. Among them was the young and handsome son of the count de Namur (who was stilled the Vaissier de Celles, lord de Balastre), which, when told to the duke, greatly afflicted him; and he bitterly lamented his lofs, for he was of a most amiable character, and had been the preceding year his companion at arms in Prussia.

A council was held in the field, whether or not to retire to Grave and carry their prisoners thither; but the duke opposed it, faying,—'I made a vow to our Lady of Nimeguen when I left that town, and which I again renewed before we began the combat: in obedience to which, I order, that we gaily return to Nimeguen, and offer our thanksgivings to the holy Virgin, who has affished us in our victory.'

This command was obeyed; for, as the duke had given it, no one made any objection; and they fet out, on their return towards Nimeguen, full gallop. It was two long leagues from the field of battle, but they were foon there.

On this fortunate news being told in that town, great rejoicings were made by both fexes; and the clergy went out in proceffion to meet the duke, and received him with acclamations. The duke did not turn to the right nor left, but rode with his knights straight to the church where the image of our Lady was, and in which he had great faith. When he had entered her chapel, he difarmed himfelf of every thing to his doublet, and offered up his armour on the altar, in honour of our Lady, returning thanksgivings for the victory he had gained over his enemics.

The banners and pennons of the enemy were all hung up in this chapel, but I know not if they be still there: the duke retired to his hôtel, and his knights knights to their homes, to pay attention to themfelves and their prisoners, from whom they expected great ransoms. When the report of this victory over the Brabanters was made public, the duke of Gueldres was more feared and honoured than before.

The duchefs of Brabant, who had refided at Bois le Duc, was much vexed, as indeed she had reason, at this unfortunate turn in her affairs, and that the siege of Grave was raised. She ordered a strong garrison into Bois le Duc to guard the frontiers, and then returned through Champagne to Brussels. She wrote frequently to the duke of Burgundy the state of things, and eagerly pressed him to assist her in the recovery of her losses; for all her hopes were in him.

You may suppose, the news of this victory was instantly known in France, particularly at the court of the king; but they were little surprised at it, rather holding it cheap, imagining, when the king marched thither, they should make themselves ample amends.

Orders were fent to fir William de la Trimouille and to fir Gervais de Merande, who had been placed by the duke of Burgundy in the three castles on the Meuse, to guard well that frontier, and to make no fallies where there should be any risk of loss; for that they would shortly hear from the king, who was preparing to visit this duke of Gueldres and his country in person.

Sir William had been greatly hurt at the late defeat of his friends, but the intelligence from France raised his spirits, and he acted conformably to the orders he had received.

Let us return to what was passing in France. The king's ardour for the invafion of Gueldreland was no way abated: he was anxious to undertake it at all events, for the challenge of the duke had mightily enraged him; and he declared that, cost what it would, he would have ample reparation, or his territories, with those of his father, the duke of Juliers, should be despoiled and burnt. Summonses were fent to all the dukes, counts, knights, barons and men at arms, of France, to provide themselves with fufficient purveyances for a long journey; and one of the marshals of France, fir Louis de Sancerre, was ordered to remain to guard the kingdom, from beyond the river Dordogne to the fea; for in Languedoc, and in the country between the Garonne and the Loire, the truce had been accepted: and the other marshal, the lord de Blainville, was to accompany the king.

The different lords made fuch immense provision of stores of all kinds, it was wonderful to think of, more especially in wines. All those in Champagne were bespoken for the king, the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, Touraine and Bourbon: carriages also, of every description, in those parts, were likewise retained for them: indeed, the preparations for this expedition were prodigious.

The duke of Brittany was still at Paris, and could not obtain any decision respecting his affairs, for the king resided chiesly at Montereau sur Yonne. He was, however, well entertained with seasts and fair words. The nobles begged of him to have patience, for he would very shortly have his business sinished; but that the king was so impatient to begin his march to Germany, he attended to nothing else. The duke was forced to make the best he could of it, perceiving he could not amend it, and, since he had come to Paris, was resolved not to depart but with the good will of the king, although his stay was attended with vast expenses.

When it was known for certain that the expedition to Gueldreland was to take place, and that a tax had been ordered throughout France for the payment of the knights and men at arms, many of the wifest in the country, whether of the council or not, said that it was ill advised to encourage a king of France to march such a distance in search of his enemies, and that the kingdom might suffer from it, (for the king was young, and very popular with his subjects), and that it would have been fully sufficient for one of the king's uncles, or both of them, with the constable of France, to have gone with fix or seven thousand lances, without carrying the person of the king thither.

The king's uncles were of a fimilar opinion; they most prudently remonstrated with him on the impropriety of his marching with his army, and were urging many strong reasons against it, when he slew into a rage, and shortly interrupted them, by saying,—'If you go thither without me, it will be contrary to my will and pleasure; but I can assure you, you shall not receive one penny, for otherwise I cannot restrain you.'

When the dukes of Berry and Burgundy heard this answer, they faw he was determined upon going, and replied,—'God be with you: you shall go then; and we will no more think of undertaking it without your company.'

These lords and the council then deliberated on an affair of fome confequence to this intended war. There had been a treaty for a long time in force, between the king of France and the emperor of Germany, which stipulated, that neither of them were to enter the territories of the other with an armed force; that is to fay, that the king of France and the emperor could not make war on each other without incurring a heavy penalty, and the fentence of the pope, who had folemnly fworn, at his coronation, to maintain these two kingdoms in peace. It was therefore refolved, in case the king perfilted in his intention of invading Gueldreland, which was a dependance on the empire, to make the emperor fully acquainted with the duke of Gueldres' rash conduct, and lay before him the infolent challenge he had fent the king of France, who, to make him fenfible of his folly, was preparing to march an army into Germany, not any way hostile to the emperor or to his territories, but folely against this duke of Gueldres, and to attack him wherever he should find him.

Sir Guy de Honcourt, a valiant knight, and fir Yves d'Orient, one of the judges in parliament, were appointed ambassadors to carry this message to the emperor. When they had received their instructions and made their preparations, they took leave of the king and his uncles, and rode for Châlons in Champagne, with an attendance fuitable to their rank, and the purpose they were going on. They met the lord de Coucy at Châlons, retaining knights and men at arms from Bar, Lorraine and Champagne for this expedition, of which he was to command the van-guard. He entertained the ambassadors one day splendidly at dinner, and on the morrow they continued the road to Sainte Menehould, and thence towards Luxembourg, to gain intelligence where the emperor was.

CHAP. XXXIV.

THE KING OF TRANCE AND HIS COUNCIL FERMIT THE DUKE OF BRITTANY TO RETURN HOME.—
THE STATES OF BRABANT SEND EXCUSES TO THE KING OF FRANCE, FOR NOT ALLOWING HIS ARMY TO PASS THROUGH THEIR COUNTRY.—
THE SUCCESS OF THE AMBASSADORS WITH THE EMPEROR.

ALTHOUGH ambassiadors had been sent to the emperor, the French did no way relax in their warlike preparations. It was signified to all to assemble in readiness for the field in or near the country of Champagne by the middle of the enfuing August; since the king had then determined to begin his march, whether or not he should receive answers, through fir Guy de Honcourt and master Yves d'Orient, from the emperor of Germany.

The king and his uncles thinking it was now time to dismis the duke of Brittany, he was summoned to Montereau, where the king most kindly received him, as did the dukes of Burgundy and Touraine. The duke of Berry was at the time in Berry making his preparations and levies of men at arms, having fixed on Poitou for the place of affembly, before they began their march. The king and the duke of Burgundy, as I have faid, treated the duke of Brittany in the most friendly manner. He had before furrendered the castles and town of Jugon to the officers of the constable, but made great difficulty to pay back the hundred thousand francs, which had been expended in the provisioning his caftles, and in retaining men at arms the whole of last winter, thinking a war would be declared against him; but he was so fairly spoken to, that he promised the king and the duke of Burgundy to repay this fum, of one hundred thousand francs, in the course of five years, by yearly payments of twenty thousand francs. The duke, after this, took leave of the king, who made him very handsome presents of jewels, and went back to Paris. The duke of Burgundy, before his departure, gave to him and his knights a magnificent entertainment in his hôtel, called the hôtel d'Artois, when they separated on the most friendly terms.

The duke of Brittany made no long stay after this at Paris; but having arranged his assairs, and had his expenses paid by his officers, he set out, taking the road to Estampes, travelled through Beauce to Beaugency on the Loire, with a numerous body of attendants riding before him. From Beaugency his attendants continued their road through the country of Blois, Touraine, Maine and Anjou; but the duke had his vessels waiting for him at Beaugency, and embarking on board a handsome yacht, with the lords de Montsort and de Malestroit, sailed down the Loire, passing under the bridge at Blois, and not stopping until he came to Nantes, when he was in his own country.

I will now leave the duke of Brittany, who strictly kept the engagements he had entered into with the king of France and his uncles, and has never since done any thing worthy of being remembered in this history, nor do I know if he ever will. If he should, I will relate it, according to the manner it shall be told me.

The king of France was bufily employed in making his preparations to invade Gueldreland. The lord de Coucy, on his return to Montereau, informed the king and his uncles, that all the chivalry of Bar, Lorraine, Burgundy, and as far as the Rhine, were ready and willing to attend them, in their expedition to Germany. The king was much pleafed on hearing this, and faid, that 'if it pleafed God, he would this year pay a vifit to his coufins of Gueldres and Juliers.' A council was held held on the most convenient line of march, when fome faid, that the shortest way would be through Tiérache *, along the frontiers of Hainault and Liege, and paffing through Brabant into Gueldres; but others proposed croffing the Meuse at or near Utrecht, and, having paffed that river, to enter Juliers, and march thence into Gueldreland. Upon this, the king and council wrote to the duchess and states of Brabant, to fignify that the king and his army intended marching through their country.-The duchess would have readily consented; but the states refused the passage, faying the country would fuffer too much from it. The principal towns and nobles were all of this opinion, and told the duchefs, that if she allowed the French to enter their country, they would never bear arms for her against Gueldres, but would shut themselves up in their castles, and defend all the entrances to the country, for they should have more damage done to themselves and lands by such passengers than if their enemy were in the country.

The duchefs, finding fo strong an opposition to allowing a passage to the French, dissembled her real thoughts, and calling to her fir John Opem, master John Grave and master Nicholas de la Monnoye, charged them to set out instantly for France, and make excuses for the states of Brabant, to the king and the duke of Burgundy, for their refusal to allow the french army to pass through Brabant; fearful lest the country would be too severely oppressed; and to entreat them, for the love of God, not to be distaissied with her, as she had done every thing in her power to obtain their consent.

* Tiérache, a fertile country in Picardy, watered by the Oife and Seine, to the west of Champagne and the south of Hainault.

These envoys left Brussels, and arrived at Montereau sur Yonne, where they found the king and his uncles, whose whole conversation, day and night, was on the expedition to Gueldreland.—They first waited on the duke of Burgundy, to whom they gave their letters, and explained so well the reasons of the states' refusal that he was contented, and, at the prayer of his aunt, promised to mediate between them and the king.

The lord de Coucy was likewife of very great fervice to them, fo that the first plan of passing through Brabant was given up, and the excuses from the duchess and her states were accepted. was then determined, as more honourable for the king and his allies, to march straight through his kingdom. A council was held on the choice of those who were to form the vanguard; and two thousand five hundred pioneers were appointed to clear away all trees and hedge-rows, and to make fmooth the roads. The army had by their means a most excellent road through France to the forest of Ardennes; but there it failed them, for rocks, forests and various obstacles opposed their passage. The lord de Coucy, who had the command of the vanguard, confisting of one thousand lances, sent forward perfons to examine which would be the fafest road for the king and the baggage to march Vol. IX. (for (for there were upwards of twelve thousand carriages, without counting baggage horses), to lay open the forest, and make roads where no traveller had ever before passed. Every one was eager to be thus employed, more particularly those who were near the king's person; for he was never so popular at any time as he was now in Flanders, nor were his subjects ever so united to assist him as in this expedition against Gueldres.

While this was passing, the king sent the lord de Coucy to Avignon, to the person who styled himself pope Clement, I know not on what business; and the viscount de Meaux, fir John de Roye and the lord de la Bonne, commanded in his absence.

We will now fay fomething of the ambaffadors who had been fent to the emperor of Germany. They continued their journey until they arrived at Convalence*, where the emperor refided. After difmounting at their hôtel, they made themselves ready to wait on him, who had before heard of their coming, and was very impatient to know the cause of it. Having assembled his council, the ambassadors were introduced to the presence of the emperor, whom they saluted most reverently, and gave him their credential letters from the king of France. After he had attentively perused them, he eyed fir Guy de Honcourt, and said, 'Guy, tell us, in the name of God, what you are charged with.' The knight spoke long and ably in explaining to the emperor and his council the reasons why the king of France was about to enter the german territory with a large army, not with the finallest intent to injure that or any other part of the territories belonging to the emperor, but against a perfonal enemy. He then named him, and added,— 6 The duke of Gueldres has thought proper to fend the king of France a most insolent challenge, couched in outrageous language, not usual in such cases, for which the king and his council have determined to punish him. The king, therefore, entreats you, dear fire, from your connections with him by blood, that you will not abet this duke in his prefumptuous conduct, but keep those treaties of alliance which have formerly been made between you and France, as he on his part is refolved to abide by them.'

# Convalence. Q. Constance.

The emperor, in reply, faid,—' Sir Guy, we have fome time been informed, that our coufin the king of France has been collecting a large body of men at arms, at a vast expense, when it was unnecessary for him to give himself so much trouble for so small an object; for, had he made his complaints to me, I would have forced the duke of Gueldres to hear reason without the great expense he has been at.' 'Sire,' answered fir Guy, 'you are very kind in thus expressing yourself; but our lord, the king of France, values neither expense nor trouble wherever his honour is concerned; and his council are solely anxious that you should not be distatissied with him, for he is determined in no way to infringe the treaties that exist between France and

Q 2

Germany:

Germany: on the contrary, to strengthen them as much as possible, and for this have fir Yves d'Orient and myself been sent hither.' 'We are by no means,' faid the emperor, 'dissatisfied with what is doing in France, and thank my cousin for the information he sends me: let him come, in God's name, for I do not intend to move.'

The ambassadors were well pleased with this reply, and considered the matter as concluded to their wish. They requested answers to the letters they had brought, which were cheerfully promised. They dined that day in the emperor's palace, and by his orders were well feasted. In the evening they retired to their lodgings, and managed things so well that the business was finished to their satisfaction. Having received their letters in reply to those they had brought, they took leave of the emperor, and returned by the way they had come to the king of France; of whom we will now speak.

CHAP. XXXV.

THE COUNT DE BLOIS SENDS TWO HUNDRED LANCES TO SERVE THE KING IN HIS EXPEDITION TO GUELDRES.—THE AMBASSADORS BRING FAVOURABLE ANSWERS FROM THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.—THE KING OF FRANCE CONTINUES HIS MARCH TOWARD THE FOREST OF ARDENNES.— SIR HELION DE LIGNAC MAKES HIS REPORT TO THE DUKE OF BERRY, TOUCHING HIS MARRIAGE WITH THE DAUGHTER OF THE DUKE OF LANCASTER.

THE great lords and barons of France were bufily employed in making their preparations for the expedition to Gueldres; and those from the more distant parts of the kingdom, in Auvergne, Limousin, Quercy, Rouergue, and other provinces, had already begun their march towards Champagne. The greater numbers came from Picardy, Burgundy, Champagne, Bar, and Lorraine, because they were nearer the place of assembly. The villages in France were not so harshly treated as usual; for the king had forbidden, under pain of death, that any thing should be taken from them without payment.

Notwithstanding this order was made very public, lic, the men at arms on their march did much mischief; for, though the punishment was so heavy, they could not abstain from what they had been accustomed to. They were indeed very badly paid, and consequently thought they had a right to provide for themselves. This was the excuse they made whenever they were reprimanded by their captain or marshal.

The count de Blois was fummoned, and he returned for answer, he would fend two hundred chosen lances, well equipped and paid. I know not how he was dealt withal, but he fent two hundred knights and squires to serve the king, from his county of Blois, under the command of the lord de Vienne, fir William de Saint Martin, fir William de Chaumont and the lord de Montigny, who marched at their leisure towards Champagne, whither they had been ordered.

The king of France left Montereau fur Yonne, and took the road for Châlons in Champagne, without the duke of Berry joining him. He was still in Berry, waiting the return of fir Helion de Lignac, with answers from the duke of Lancaster. respecting his marriage with his daughter. He however received none; for the duke of Lancaster detained him at Bayonne, dissembling his opinion between him and the ambassadors from Castille; but he was more inclined, as well as the duches, to close with the last; yet, before them, he shewed the utmost attentions to fir Helion, to make them the more eager to finish the business.

The castillian ambassadors laboured hard to bring the marriage to a conclusion. They were four in number, don Fernando de Léon, doctor in divinity and confessor to the king, the bishop of Segovia, don Pedro Godelopie and don Diego Loup, who were continually going or returning from one party to the other. The duke, however, gave them to understand, that he would prefer an union with Castille to one with France, provided they would agree to his terms. He demanded payment of fix hundred thousand francs within three years, twelve thousand francs annually for his and the duches's lives, and two thousand more for the duches's household yearly*.

When it was known that the king had left Montereau for Châlons, all those who had remained at home hastened their march to join him. Thither came the duke of Berry, whose quarters were at Espinay, and the duke of Bourbon, the count de la Marche, the dauphin d'Auvergne, the count de Sancerre, the count de St. Pol, the count de Ton-

* Collins, in his life of John of Gaunt, mentions the following terms as agreed on by the duke of Lancaster and king of Castille.

<sup>1</sup>mo, That Henry of Castille, on his marriage with the lady Constance, should bear the title of prince of Assurias.

<sup>2</sup>do, That the kingdom of Castille, &c. revert to them after the death of the present king, and to their heirs. In default of heirs, to Edmund of York, who had married don Pedro's second daughter.

<sup>3</sup>tio, That the king of Castille should pay the duke of Lancaster 200,000. towards the charges of his expedition, and 10,000. per annum during his and the duches's lives.

nerre. Near the king's person were the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Lorraine, the duke of Touraine, the constable of France, fir John de Vienne, fir Guy de la Trimouille, fir Barrois des Barres and fir John de Bueil.

The whole country round Rheims and Châlons, to the extent of twelve leagues, was destroyed by these men at arms, who were dispersed over it, from Sainte Menehould to Monstier in Bar, to Chaumont in Bassigni*, to Vitry en Pertois†, and the whole of the bishopricks of Troyes and Langres. The lord de Coucy was not yet returned from his journey to Avignon.

About this time, fir Guy de Honcourt and fir Yves d'Orient came back from their embassy to the emperor, and met the king at Chalons. The king and his nobles were rejoiced at their arrival, and inquired the news. They told them all that had passed; that the emperor had very kindly received them and handsomely entertained them; and fir Guy added,—'Sire, and you my lords, when the emperor and his council had read your letters and the copy of the duke of Gueldres' challenge, they were very indignant at his presumption, and are desirous, from what we could learn, that he should be punished for his insolence: nor will the emperor make any opposition to your intended war, which he feems indeed much to approve of, but keep strictly to all the articles of the treaties entered into between him and France, so that all your doubts concerning his conduct may be difsipated.'

* Bassigni, a finall country on the confines of Champagne and Lorraine: Chaumont is the capital.

† Vitry en Pertois, a finall town in Champagne, near Vitry le François.

The king of France and his council were well fatisfied on hearing this, although many faid, that whether the emperor would or not, they were in fufficient numbers to go whither they pleafed without fearing any one.

The king gave orders for the march of the army, and he left Châlons for Grand Pré*, where he remained for three days. He could not make any long marches from the great concourse of men that were in his front, in his rear, and on all sides; and he was forced to move gently on account of his great train of baggage and purveyances, which occupied a length of fourteen country leagues, and was daily increasing.

The count de Grand Pré received the king in his town with every respect, and ordered all things so much to the king's pleasure, that he expressed his satisfaction to the count, who was attached to the van division. The duke of Lorraine and sir Henry de Bar here joined the king with a hand-some company of men at arms. The duke of Lorraine was ordered to the division of his son-in-law, the lord de Coucy, but fir Henry de Bar remained near the king.

* Grand Pré, a town in Champagne, election of Sainte

The pioneers had been continually employed in clearing the forest of Ardennes, by felling of timber, and making roads where none had ever been before. They had much difficulty in the filling up of valleys and forming a tolerable road for the carriages to pass, and there were upwards of three thousand workmen who laboured at nothing else, from Vierton to Neuschâtel in the Ardennes.

The duchefs of Brabant was exceedingly pleafed when the heard for certain that the king of France was on his march through the Ardennes, and concluded fhe fhould now have her revenge on the duke of Gueldres, and that the king of France would make both him and his father, the duke of Juliers, repent of their conduct, which had given her many mortifications. She fet out in handsome array from Bruffels, accompanied by the lord de Samines in the Ardennes, the lord de Bocelars, the lord de Broquehort and feveral others, for Luxembourg, to receive the king, and have fome conversation with him. She crossed the Meuse by the bridge at Huy*, and went to Bastoigne, where she halted; for the king was to pass there, or very near it, which he did. When he fet out from Grand Pré, he crossed the Meuse at Morsay †, with his whole army; but his marches were very fhort, for the reasons I have before given.

* Hny, a town in the bishoprick of Liege, capital of the Condrotz, on the confluence of the small river Huy and the Mouse.

+ Morfay. Q. Mouzon.

News was brought to the dukes of Juliers and Gueldres, for fuch intelligence is foon fread abroad, that the king of France was on his march to vifit them, with an army of one hundred thoufand men; and that he had never collected fo large a body, except when he marched to Bourbourg, imagining the English to be in greater force than he found them.

The duke of Juliers began to be greatly alarmed; but his fon, the duke of Gueldres, made light of it, faving,—' Let them come: the greater the number, the fooner will they be worn down, their baggage destroyed, and their purveyances ruined. Winter is coming on, and my country is a ftrong one: they will not eafily enter it, and, when they make the attempt, shall be driven back with other founds than trumpets. They must always keep together, which will be impossible, if they mean to invade my territory; and, if they feparate, my people will take them whether they will or no.-However, our coufin of France shews good courage; and I give him credit for doing what I would attempt if in his place.' Such were the converfations the duke of Gueldres held with his knights on this fubject; but the duke of Juliers was, on the contrary, quite disconsolate; for he saw, if the French were determined on it, his country must be ruined and burnt. He fent for his brother, the archbishop of Cologne, and his cousin, fir Arnold de Hornes, bishop of Liege, to consult with them on the occasion, and see if there were any probable remedy to prevent his lands being despoiled.

These two prelates gave him the best advice in their power, and recommended him to humble himself before the king of France and his uncles, and submit to their will. The duke having answered, that he would most cheerfully do so, the bishop of Utrecht, who was likewise present, with the assent of the archbishop, advised the bishop of Liege to set out with his array to meet the king of France, and treat with him on this subject.

The king of France continued his march, but only two, three or four leagues a day, and fometimes not one, from the great baggage, which was too large by far, that accompanied him. Sir William de Lignac, and his brother fir Helion, joined the king between Mouzon and Nôtre Dame d'Amot*, where the duke of Berry, with his body of five hundred spears, was quartered. Sir William had come from the fiege of Ventadour by orders of the duke of Berry, as had fir John Bonne-lance by fimilar ones from the duke of Bourbon. They had left their army under the command of fir John Bouteiller and fir Lewis d'Ambiere, as they were defirous of attending the king in this expedition.-Sir Helion had come from Bayonne, where he had been treating, as you have heard, with the duke of Lancaster for the marriage of his daughter with the duke of Berry.

* Amot. Q. Arlon.

The duke of Berry made him good cheer, and inquired after his fuccess. Sir Helion related every thing that had passed, and told him the king of Castille was earnestly negotiating a peace with the duke of Lancaster by the union of his son, the prince of Galicia, with his daughter. The duke was very pensive on hearing this, and, after a pause, said,—'s Sir Helion, you will return to France; and I will send you once more, accompanied by the bishop of Poitiers, for the duke of Lancaster's decisive answer; but at this moment we have enough on our hands.

This fame week, the lord de Coucy returned from Avignon to the king in the Ardennes, to the great joy of the whole army.

CHAP. XXXVI.

THE PRINCIPAL BARONS OF SCOTLAND ASSEMBLE IN ARMS TO MAKE WAR ON ENGLAND.—THEY LEARN FROM A SPY WHOM THEY TAKE PRISONER THAT THE ENGLISH ARE ACQUAINTED WITH THEIR INTENTIONS.

HAVE before related in this history the troubles king Richard of England had suffered from his quarrels with his uncles, urged on by the wicked counsel of the duke of Ireland, which had caused caused several knights to lose their heads, and the archbishop of York nearly to be deprived of his benefice. By the advice of the archbishop of Canterbury and the king's new council, the lord Neville, who had commanded the desence of the frontier of Northumberland for two years against the Social was distributed that the revises he had been paid, by the recent of Northumberland and Durham, the rem of recent thousand francs annually.

Sir Heary Percy being appointed in his stead to this command, with a palary of eleven thousand francs yearly, was a circumstance which created much animosity and hatred between the Percies and Nevilles, who were neighbours and had been friends. The barons and knights of Scotland, knowing of this, determined on an inroad to England, as the opportunity was favourable, now the English were quarrelling among themselves, to make some return for the many insults they had suffered from them.

In order that their intentions might not be known, they appointed a feast to be holden at Aberdeen, on the borders of the Highlands. The greater part of the barons attended; and it was then resolved, that on the middle of August of the year 1388, they would assemble all their forces at a castle called Jedworth, situated amidst deep forests and on the borders of Cumberland. Having arranged every thing concerning this business, they separated, but never mentioned one word of their intentions tentions to the king; for they faid among themfelves, he knew nothing about war.

On the appointed day, earl James Douglas first arrived at Jedworth: then came John earl of Moray, the earl of March and Dunbar, fir William de Fif, Stephen earl of Menteith*, William carl of Mar, fir Archibald Douglas, fir Robert Avercequi, fir Marc Ordrennen, fir William and fir James Lindfay, fir Thomas Bery, fir Alexander Lindfay, the lord de Sechin, fir John de Sobelans, fir Patrick Dunbar, fir John Sinclair, fir Patrick Sohopbone, fir John Montgomery, fon to the lord of that name, and his two other fons; fir John Malifnel, fir Adam de Gladivin, fir William de Redurin, fir William Stanac, fir John de Halpebreton, fir Alidier and fir Robert Landre, fir Stephen Frazer, fir Alexander and fir John Ramfay, fir William de Morbereth, fir Maubert Here, fir William de Waleram, fir John Amoustan, David Filium, Robert Colennie, with numbers of other knights and fquires of Scotland†.

There had not been feen, for fixty years, fo nu-

* Earl of Menteith.— At the time of this battle (of Otterbourne), the earldom of Menteith was possessed by Robert Stewart, earl of Fise, third son of king Robert II. who, according to Buchanan, commanded the Scots that entered by Carlisle. But our minstrel had probably an eye to the family of Graham, who had this earldom when the battle was written.'

*Reliques of Ancient English Postry.

treaduces of Incient Engight 1 02114

† For an explanation of these names, see page 271.

merous an affembly: they amounted to twelve hundred spears and forty thousand other men and archers. With the use of the bow the Scots are little acquainted; but they sling their axes over their shoulders, and, when engaged in battle, give deadly blows with them.

These lords were well pleased on meeting each other, and declared they would never return to their homes without having made an inroad on England, and to such an effect that it should be remembered for twenty years to come. The more completely to combine their plans, they fixed another meeting to be held at a church in the forest of Jedworth, called Zedon*, before they began their march to England.

Intelligence was carried to the earl of Northumberland (for every thing is known to those who are diligent in their inquiries), to his children, to the sénéschal of York and to sir Matthew Redman, governor of Berwick, of the great feast that was to be kept at Aberdeen. To learn what was done at it, these lords sent thither heralds and minstrels. The scots barons could not transact their business so secretly but it was known to these minstrels, that there was to be a grand assembly of men at arms in the forest of Jedworth. They observed also much agitation through the country, and, on their return to Newcastle, gave a faithful report of all they had seen or heard to their lords.

* Zedon. The monaftery of Zedon, at which the fcottish leaders are said to have held their meeting previous to entering England, is, I should suppose, the modern Kirk-Yetholm, exactly upon the borders, and near the foot of Chevion: the name is pronounced Yetto'n, which comes very near Yedon.'—W. S.

The barons and knights of Northumberland in confequence made their preparations, but very fecretly, that the Scots might not know of it and put off their intended inroad, and had retired to their castles, ready to fally forth on the first notice of the arrival of the enemy. They said,—'If the Scots enter the country through Cumberland by Carlisle, we will ride into Scotland, and do them more damage than they can do to us; for theirs is an open country, which may be entered any where, but ours is the contrary, with strong and well fortisted towns and castles.'

To be more fure of their intentions, they refolved to fend an english gentleman, well acquainted with the country, to this meeting in the forest of Jedworth. The english squire journeyed without interruption until he came to the church of Yetholm, where the fcots barons were affembled, and entered it, as a fervant following his mafter, and heard the greater part of their plans. When the meeting was near breaking up, he left the church on his return, and went to a tree, thinking to find his horse which he had tied there by the bridle, but he was gone; for a Scotfman (they are all thieves) had stolen him. He was fearful of making a noise about it, and fet off on foot, though booted and fpurred. He had not gone two bow-shots from the church before he was noticed by two fcots knights who were in conversation. The first who saw him faid,—'I have witnessed many wonderful things, but what I now see is equal to any: that man yonder has, I believe, lost his horse, and yet makes no inquiries after it. On my troth, I doubt much if he belongs to us: let us go after him, and see whether I am right or not.'

Vol. IX. R faid.

The two knights foon overtook him. On their approach, he was alarmed and wished himself any where else. They asked him whither he was going, whence he had come, and what he had done with his horse. As he contradicted himself in his answers, they laid hands on him, and said he must come before their captains, and was brought back to the church of Yetholm, to the earl of Douglas and the other lords. They examined him closely, for they knew him for an Englishman, as to the reasons he had come thither, and assured him, if he did not truly answer all their questions, his head should be struck off; but, if he told the truth, no harm should happen to him.

Very unwillingly he obeyed, for the love of life prevailed; and the fcots barons learnt that he had been fent by the earl of Northumberland to discover the number of their forces, and whither they were to march. This intelligence gave them the greatest pleasure, and they would not on any account but have taken this spy.

He was asked where the barons of Northumberland were? if they had any intentions of making an excursion? and what road to Scotland they would take; along the sea-shore from Berwick to Dunbar, or by the mountains through the country of Menteith to Stirling? He replied, - 'Since you will force me to tell the truth, when I left New: castle, there were not any signs of an excursion being made; but the barons are all ready to fet out at a moment's warning, as foon as they shall hear you have entered England. They will not oppose you, for they are not in sufficient numbers to meet fo large a body as you are reported to them to confift of.' 'And what do they estimate our numbers at in Northumberland?' faid lord Moray. 'They fay, my lord,' replied the fquire, 'that you have full forty thousand men, and twelve hundred spears; and by way of counteracting your career, should you march to Cumberland, they will take the road through Berwick to Dunbar, Dalkeith and Edinburgh: if you follow the other road, they will then march to Carlifle, and enter your country by these mountains.'

The fcottish lords, on hearing this, were filent, but looked at each other. The english squire was delivered to the governor of the castle of Jedworth, with orders to have particular guard over him; when they conferred together in the church of Yetholm, and formed other plans.

CHAP. XXXVII.

THE SCOTS FORM THEIR ARMY INTO TWO DIVISIONS; ONE, UNDER THE COMMAND OF SIR
ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS, MARCHES TO CARLISLE, AND THE OTHER TO NEWCASTLE ON TYNE, COMMANDED BY THE EARL OF DOUGLAS,—AT THE BARRIERS OF WHICH PLACE, HE CONQUERS
THE PENNON OF SIR HENRY PERCY.

THE barons of Scotland were in high spirits at this intelligence, and confidered their fuccess as certain, now they knew the disposition of the enemy. They held a council, as to their mode of proceeding, and the wifest and most accustomed to arms, fuch as fir Archibald Douglas, the earl of Fife, fir Alexander Ramfay, fir John Sinclair and fir James Lindfay, were the speakers: they faid,-'That to avoid any chance of failing in their attempt, they would advise the army to be divided, and two expeditions to be made, fo that the enemy might be puzzled whither to march their forces. The largest division, with the baggage, should go to Carlifle, in Cumberland; and the other, confifting of three or four hundred spears, and two thousand frout infantry and archers, all well mounted, should make for Newcastle on Tyne, cross the river, and enter Durham, spoiling and burning the country. They will have committed great waste in England before our enemies can have any information of their their being there: if we find they come in pursuit of us, which they certainly will, we will then unite together, and fix on a proper place to offer them battle, as we all feem to have that defire, and to gain honour; for it is time to repay them some of the mischiefs they have done to us.'

This plan was adopted, and fir Archibald Douglas, the earl of Fife, the earl of Sutherland, the earl of Menteith, the earl of Mar, the earl of Stratherne, fir Stephen Frazer, fir George Dunbar, with fixteen other great barons of Scotland, were ordered to the command of the largest division that was to march to Carlisle. The earl of Douglas, the earl of March and Dunbar, and the earl of Moray were appointed leaders of the three hundred picked lances and two thousand infancry, who were to advance to Newcastle on Tyne and invade Northumberland.

When these two divisions separated, the lords took a very affectionate leave of each other, promising that if the English took the sield against them, they would not sight until they were all united, which would give them such a superiority of force as must ensure victory. They then left the forest of Jedworth, one party marching to the right and the other to the left.

The barons of Northumberland not finding their fquire return, nor hearing any thing of the Scots, began to suspect the accident which had happened. They therefore ordered every one to be prepared to march at a moment's notice, or when they should hear of the Scots having entered the country, for they confidered their fquire as loft.

Let us return to the expedition under the earl of Douglas and his companions, for they had more to do than the divition that went to Carlifle, and were eager to perform fome deeds of arms. When the earls of Douglas, Moray and March were feparated from the main body, they determined to crofs the Tyne and enter the bishoprick of Durham, and, after they had despoiled and burnt that country as far as the city of Durham, to return by Newcastle, and quarter themselves there in spite of the English.

This they executed, and riding at a good pace, through bye roads, without attacking town, castle or house, arrived on the lands of the lord Percy, and crossed the river Tyne, without any opposition, at the place they had fixed on, about three leagues above Newcastle, near to Brancepeth*, where they entered the rich country of Durham, and instantly began their war, by burning towns and slaying the inhabitants.

Neither the earl of Northumberland nor the barons and knights of the country had heard any thing of their invasion: but when intelligence came to Durham and Newcastle that the Scots were abroad, which was indeed visible enough from the smoke that was every where seen, the earl of

* Brancepeth,—four miles from Durham. A ruin of a fine old caftle remains, which I believe has been lately fitted up and repaired for a refidence.

Northumberland fent his two fons to Newcastle; but he himself remained at Alnwick, and issued his orders for every one to repair thither also. Before his sons left him, he said,—'You will hasten to Newcastle, where the whole country will join you: I will remain here, for it is the road they may return by: if we can surround them, we shall do well; but I know not for certain where they now are.'

Sir Henry and fir Ralph Percy obeyed their father's orders, and made for Newcastle, accompanied by the gentlemen and others fit to bear arms. In the mean time, the Scots continued destroying and burning all before them, so that the smoke was visible at Newcastle. They came to the gates of Durham, where they skirmished, but made no long stay, and set out on their return, as they had planned at the beginning of the expedition, driving and carrying away all the booty they thought worth their pains.

The country is very rich between Durham and Newcastle, which is but twelve english miles distant: there was not a town in all this district, unless well inclosed, that was not burnt. The Scots re-crossed the Tyne at the same place, and came before Newcastle, where they halted.

All the knights and squires of Yorkshire were collected at Newcastle, and thither came the sénéschals of York, sir Ralph Mowbray, sir Matthew Redman, governor of Berwick, sir Robert Angle, sir Thomas Grey, sir Thomas Holcon, sir John Felton, sir John Lierbon, sir William Warrichon, sir Thomas

Thomas Boynton, the baron of Helcon, fir John Colpedic, and fo many others, the town was filled with more than it could lodge.

The three fcots lords, having completed the object of their expedition into Durham, lay before Newcastle three days, where there was an almost continual skirmish. The sons of the earl of North-umberland, from their great courage, were always the first at the barriers, when many valiant deeds were done with lances hand to hand. The earl of Douglas had a long conslict with fir Henry Percy, and in it, by gallantry of arms, won his pennon, to the great vexation of fir Henry and the other English.

The earl of Douglas faid,—'I will carry this token of your prowefs with me to Scotland, and place it on the tower of my castle at Dalkeith, that it may be seen from far.' 'By God, earl of Douglas,' replied fir Henry, 'you shall not even bear it out of Northumberland: be assured you shall never have this pennon to brag of.' 'You must come then,' answered earl Douglas, 'this night and seek for it. I will fix your pennon before my tent, and shall see if you will venture to take it away.'

As it was now late, the skirmish ended, and each party retired to their quarters, to disarm and comfort themselves. They had plenty of every thing, particularly sless meat. The Scots kept up a very strict watch, concluding, from the words of sir Henry Percy, they should have their quarters beaten up this night: they were disappointed, for sir Henry was advised to defer it.

CHAP, XXXVIII.

THE EARL OF DOUGLAS, WHEN ENCAMPED BE-FORE OTTERBOURNE, IS ATTACKED BY SIR HENRY PERCY, TO RE-CONQUER HIS PENNON, AND A GENERAL BATTLE ENSUES.

Newcastle; and, taking the road to their own country, they came to a town and castle called Ponclau*, of which sir Haymon d'Alphel, a very valiant knight of Northumberland, was the lord. They halted there about four o'clock in the morning, as they learnt the knight to be within it, and made preparations for the assault. This was done with such courage, that the place was won, and the knight made prisoner. After they had burnt the town and castle, they marched away for Otterbourne†, which was eight english leagues from Newcastle, and there encamped themselves.

This day, they made no attack; but, very early on the morrow, their trumpets founded, and they made ready for the affault, advancing toward the caftle, which was tolerably ftrong, and fituated among marshes. They attacked it so long and so unfuccessfully, that they were fatigued, and therefore founded a retreat. When they had retired to their quarters, the chiefs held a council how to act; and the greater part were for decamping on the morrow, without attempting more against the castle, to join their countrymen in the neighbourhood of Carlifle. But the earl of Douglas overruled this, by faying; 'In despite of fir Henry Percy, who the day before yesterday declared he would take from me his pennon, that I conquered by fair deeds of arms before the gates of Newcastle, I will not depart hence for two or three days; and we will renew our attack on the castle, for it is to be taken: we shall thus gain double honour, and see if within that time he will come for his pennon: if he do, it fhall be well defended.'

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;Ponclau. Pontland, a village on the Blythe, about five miles from Newcattle.'-W. S.

† Otterbourne—is so well known from this celebrated battle, and the old ballads, that it is almost needless to say it is situated in the parish of Elsdon, Northumberland.

Every one agreed to what earl Douglas had faid; for it was not only honourable, but he was the principal commander; and, from affection to him, they quietly returned to their quarters. They made huts of trees and branches, and strongly fortified themselves. They placed their baggage and servants at the entrance of the marsh on the road to Newcastle, and the cattle they drove into the marsh lands.

I will return to fir Henry and fir Ralph Percy, who were greatly mortified that the earl of Douglas should have conquered their pennon in the skirmish before Newcastle. They felt the more for this difgrace, because fir Henry had not kept his word; for he had told the earl, that he should never carry his pennon out of England, and this he had explained to the knights who were with him in Newcastle.

The English imagined the army under the earl of Douglas to be only the van of the Scots, and that the main body was behind; for which reason those knights who had the most experience in arms, and were the best acquainted with warlike affairs, strongly opposed the proposal of fir Henry Percy to purfue them. They faid,—'Sir, many loffes happen in war: if the earl of Douglas has won your pennon, he has bought it dear enough; for he has come to the gates to feek it, and has been well fought with. Another time you will gain from him as much, if not more. We fay fo, because you know as well as we do, that the whole power of Scotland has taken the field. We are not fufficiently ftrong to offer them battle; and perhaps this skirmish may have been only a trick to draw us out of the town; and if they be, as reported, forty thousand strong, they will furround us, and have us at their mercy. It is much better to lose a pennon than two or three hundred knights and squires, and leave our country in a defenceless ftate.'

This fpeech checked the eagerness of the two brothers Percy, for they would not act contrary to the opinion of the council; when other news was brought them by some knights and squires who had followed and observed the Scots, their numbers, disposition, and where they had halted. This was all fully related by knights who had traversed the whole extent of country the Scots had passed through, that they might carry to their lords the most exact information. They thus spoke,—'Sir Henry and sir Ralph Percy, we come to tell you that we have followed the scottish army, and observed all the country where they now are. They sirst halted at Pontland, and took sir Haymon de Alphel in his castle: thence they went to Otterbourne, and took up their quarters for the night. We are ignorant of what they did on the morrow, but they seemed to have taken measures for a long stay. We know for certain that their army does not consist of more than three thousand men, including all forts.'

Sir Henry Percy, on hearing this, was greatly rejoiced, and cried out; 'To horse! to horse! for by the faith I owe my God, and to my lord and father, I will feek to recover my pennon, and to beat up their quarters this night.' Such knights and squires in Newcastle as learnt this were willing to be of the party, and made themselves ready.

The bishop of Durham was expected daily at that town; for he had heard of the irruption of the Scots, and that they were before it, in which were the sons of the earl of Northumberland preparing to offer them combat. The bishop had collected a number of men, and was hastening to their assistance, but sir Henry Percy would not wait; for he was accompanied by six hundred spears, of knights and squires, and upwards of eight thousand infantry, which, he said, would be more than enough to fight the Scots, who were but three hundred lances and two thousand others.

When they were all assembled, they left New-castle after dinner, and took the field in good array, following the road the Scots had taken, making for Otterbourne, which was eight short leagues distant; but they could not advance very fast, that their infantry might keep up with them.

As the Scots were fupping, fome indeed were gone to fleep, for they had laboured hard during the day, at the attack of the castle, and intended renewing it in the cool of the morning, the English arrived, and mistook, at their entrance, the huts of the fervants for those of their masters.— They forced their way into the camp, which was, however, tolerably strong, shouting out, 'Percy! Percy!' In fuch cases, you may suppose an alarm is foon given, and it was fortunate for the Scots the English had made their first attack on their servants' quarters, which checked them fome little. The Scots, expecting the English, had prepared accordingly; for, while the lords were arming themselves, they ordered a body of their infantry to join their fervants and keep up the skirmish. As their men were armed, they formed themselves under the pennons of the three principal barons, who each had his particular appointment.

In the mean time, the night advanced, but it was fufficiently light; for the moon shone, and it was the month of August, when the weather is temperate and serene.

When the Scots were quite ready, and properly arrayed, arrayed, they left their camp in filence, but did not march to meet the English. They skirted the fide of a mountain which was hard by; for, during the preceding day, they had well examined the country around, and said among themselves, 'Should the English come to beat up our quarters, we will do so and so,' and thus settled their plans beforehand, which was the saving of them; for it is of the greatest advantage to men at arms, when attacked in the night, to have previously arranged their mode of defence, and well to have weighed the chance of victory or defeat.

The English had soon overpowered the servants; but, as they advanced into the camp, they sound fresh bodies ready to oppose them, and to continue the sight. The Scots, in the mean time, marched along the mountain side, and fell on the enemy's slank quite unexpectedly, shouting their cries.—This was a great surprise to the English, who, however, formed themselves in better order, and reinforced that part of their army. The cries of Percy and Douglas resounded on each side.

The battle now raged: great was the pushing of lances, and very many of each party were struck down at the first onset. The English being more numerous, and anxious to defeat the enemy, kept in a compact body, and forced the Scots to retire, who were on the point of being discomsited.

The earl of Douglas being young, and impatient to gain renown in arms, ordered his banner to advance, shouting, 'Douglas! Douglas!' Sir Henry and sir Ralph Percy, indignant for the affront the earl of Douglas had put on them, by conquering their pennon, and defirous of meeting him, hastened to the place from which the founds came, calling out 'Percy! Percy!'

The two banners met, and many gallant deeds of arms enfued. The English were in superior strength, and fought so lustily that they drove back the Scots. Sir Patrick Hepburne, and his son of the same name, did honour to their knighthood and country, by their gallantry, under the banner of Douglas, which would have been conquered but for the vigorous defence they made; and this circumstance not only contributed to their personal credit, but the memory of it is continued with honour to their descendants.

I was made acquainted with all the particulars of this battle by knights and fquires who had been actors in it on each fide. There were also, with the English, two valiant knights from the county of Foix, whom I had the good fortune to meet at Orthès the year after this battle had been fought. Their names were fir John de Châteauneuf and John de Cautiron. On my return from Foix, I met likewife at Avignon a knight and two fquires of Scotland, of the party of earl Douglas. They knew me again, from the recollections I brought to their minds of their own country; for in my youth, I, the author of this history, travelled all through Scotland, and was full fifteen days refident with William earl of Douglas, father of earl James, of whom we are now speaking, at his castle of Dalkeith, five miles distant from Edinburgh.-

Earl James was then very young, but a promifing youth, and he had a fifter called Blanche*.

I had my information, therefore, from both parties, who agreed that it was the hardest and rost obstinate bartle that was ever fought. This I readily believed, for the English and Scots are excellent men at arms, and whenever they meet in beatter they do not spare each other; nor is there any check to their courage fo long as their weapons endure.— When they have well beaten each other, and one party is victorious, they are fo proud of their conquest, that they ransom their prisoners instantly, and in fuch courteous manner to those who have been taken, that on their departure they return them their thanks. However, when in battle, there is no boy's play between them, nor do they shrink from the combat; and you will fee, in the further detail of this battle, as excellent deeds performed as were ever witneffed.

* Blanche. Earl William Douglas was first married to Margaret, daughter of the earl of Mar. By her he had two children, James, who forceeded him in his honours, and IJabel

CHAP. XXXIX.

THE EARL OF DOUGLAS, IN RALLYING HIS MEN WHO WERE RETREATING, IS MORTALLY WOUNDED.—
SIR RALPH PERCY, BADLY WOUNDED, SURRENADERS TO SIR JOHN MAXWELL, WHO PUTS HIM IN THE HANDS OF THE EARL OF MORAY.

THE knights and fquires of either party were anxious to continue the combat with vigour as long as their spears might be capable of holding. Cowardice was there unknown, and the most splendid courage was every where exhibited by the gallant youths of England and Scotland: they were so closely intermixed, that the archers' bows were useles, and they fought hand to hand without either battalion giving way. The Scots behaved most valiantly, for the English were three to one. I do not mean to say the English did not acquit themselves well; for they would sooner be slain or made prisoners in battle, than reproached with slight.

As I before mentioned, the two banners of Douglas and Percy met, and the men at arms, under each, exerted themselves by every means, to gain the victory; but the English, at this attack, were fo much the stronger, that the Scots were driven Voi. IX.

back. The earl of Douglas, who was of a high fpirit, feeing his men repulfed, feized a battle-axe with both his hands, like a gallant knight, and, to rally his men, dashed into the midst of his enemies, and gave fuch blows on all around him, that no one could withstand them, but all made way for him on every fide; for there were none fo well armed with helmets or plates but that they fuffered from his battle-axe. Thus he advanced, like another Hector, thinking to recover and conquer the field, from his own prowefs, until he was met by three spears that were pointed at him: one struck him on the shoulder, another on the stomach, near the belly, and the third entered his thigh. could never difengage himfelf from these spears, but was borne to the ground fighting desperately. From that moment he never rofe again. Some of his knights and squires had sollowed him, but not all; for, though the moon shone, it was rather dark.

The three english lances knew they had struck down some person of considerable rank, but never thought it was earl Douglas: had they known it, they would have been so rejoiced that their courage would have been redoubled, and the fortune of the day had consequently been determined to their side. The Scots were ignorant also of their loss until the battle was over, otherwise they would certainly, from despair, have been discomsited.

I will relate what befel the earl afterward. As, foon as he fell, his head was cleaved with a battle-axe, the spear thrust through his thigh, and the main main body of the English marched over him without paying any attention, not supposing him to be their principal enemy.

In another part of the field the earl of March and Dunbar combated valiantly; and the English gave the Scots full employment who had followed the earl of Douglas, and had engaged with the two Percies.

The earl of Moray behaved fo gallantly in purfuing the English, that they knew not how to resist him.

Of all the battles that have been described in this history, great and small, this of which I am now speaking was the best fought and the most severe; for there was not a man, knight or squire, who did not acquit himself gallantly, hand to hand with his enemy. It resembled something that of Cocherel, which was as long and as hardily disputed.

The fons of the earl of Northumberland, fir Henry and fir Ralph Percy, who were the leaders of this expedition, behaved themselves like good knights in the combat. Almost a similar accident befel fir Ralph as that which happened to the earl of Douglas; for, having advanced too far, he was surrounded by the enemy and severely wounded, and, being out of breath, surrendered himself to a scots knight, called fir John Makirel*, who was under the command, and of the household, of the earl of Moray.

* Makirel,-Maxwelle.-Pinkerton's Highory of Scotland.

When made prisoner, the knight asked him who he was; for it was dark, and he knew him not. Sir Ralph was so weakened by loss of blood, which was flowing from his wound, that he could scarcely avow himself to be fir Ralph Percy. 'Well,' replied the knight, 'fir Ralph, rescued or not, you are my prisoner: my name is Maxwelle.' 'I agree to it,' faid fir Ralph, 'but pay some attention to me; for I am so desperately wounded, that my drawers and greaves are full of blood.'

Upon this, the fcots knight was very attentive to him; when fuddenly hearing the cry of Moray hard by, and perceiving the earl's banner advancing to him, fir John addressed himself to the earl of Moray, and faid,—' My lord, I present you with fir Ralph Percy, as a prisoner; but let good care be taken of him, for he is very badly wounded.'

The earl was much pleased at this, and replied, 'Maxwelle, thou hast well earned thy spurs this day.' He then ordered his men to take every care of fir Ralph, who bound up and staunched his wounds. The battle still continued to rage, and no one could say at that moment which side would be the conqueror, for there were very many captures and rescues that never came to my knowledge.

CHAP. XL.

THE EARL OF DOUGLAS, THOUGH MORTALLY WOUNDED, ORDERS HIS BANNER TO BE RAISED, AS THE BEARER HAD BEEN SLAIN, AND FORBIDS HIS LAMENTABLE STATE TO BE MADE KNOWN TO HIS MEN, URGING THEM ON TO THE COMBAT, BY WHICH THEY DEFEAT THEIR ENEMIES AND MAKE SIR HENRY PERCY WITH MANY MORE PRISONERS.

THE young earl of Douglas had this night performed wonders in arms. When he was struck down, there was a great crowd round him; and he could not raife himfelf, for the blow on his head was mortal. His men had followed him as closely as they were able; and there came to him his coufins, fir James Lindfay, fir John and fir Walter Sinclair, with other knights and fquires. found by his fide a gallant knight that had conflantly attended him, who was his chaplain, and had at this time exchanged his profession for that of a valiant man at arms. The whole night he had followed the earl with his battle-axe in hand, and had by his exertions more than once repulfed the English. This conduct gained the thanks of his countrymen, and turned out to his advantage, for in the fame year he was promoted to the archdeaconry and made canon of Aberdeen. His name was fir William de Norbenich*. To fay the truth, he was well formed in all his limbs to shine in battle, and was severely wounded at this combat.

When these knights came to the earl of Douglas, they found him in a melancholy state, as well as one of his knights, fir Robert Hart, who had fought by his side the whole of the night, and now lay beside him, covered with sisteen wounds from lances and other weapons.

Sir John Sinclair asked the earl, 'Cousin, how fares it with you?' 'But fo fo,' replied he.-' Thanks to God, there are but few of my anceftors who have died in chambers or in their beds. I bid you, therefore, revenge my death, for I have but little hope of living, as my heart becomes every minute more faint. Do you Walter and fir John Sinclair raife up my banner, for certainly it is on the ground, from the death of David Collemine, that valiant fquire, who bore it, and who refused knighthood from my hands this day, though he was equal to the most eminent knights for courage or loyalty, and continue to fhout 'Douglas!' but do not tell friend or foe whether I am in your company or not; for, should the enemy know the truth, they will be greatly rejoiced.'

The two brothers Sinclair, and fir John Lindfay, obeyed his orders. The banner was raifed and 'Douglas!' shouted. Their men, who had remained behind, hearing the shouts of 'Douglas,

* William of North Berwick. See note, p. 271.

Douglas!' fo often repeated, ascended a small eminence, and pushed their lances with such courage that the English were repulsed, and many killed or struck to the ground. The Scots, by thus valiantly driving the enemy beyond the spot where the earl of Douglas lay dead, for he had expired on giving his last orders, arrived at his banner, which was borne by fir John Sinclair. Numbers were continually increasing, from the repeated shouts of Douglas!' and the greater part of the scots knights and squires were now there.

The earls of Moray and March, with their banners and men, came thither also. When they were all thus collected, perceiving the English retreat, they renewed the battle with greater vigour than before. To fay the truth, the English had harder work than the Scots, for they had come by a forced march that evening from Newcastle on Tyne, which was eight english leagues distant, to meet the Scots, by which means the greater part were exceedingly fatigued before the combat began. The Scots, on the contrary, had reposed themselves, which was to them of the utmost advantage, as was apparent from the event of the battle. In this last attack, they fo completely repulfed the English, that the latter could never rally again, and the former drove them far beyond where the earl of Douglas lay on the ground. Sir Henry Percy, during this attack, had the misfortune to fall into the hands of the lord Montgomery, a very valiant knight of Scotland. They had long fought hand to hand with much valour, and without hindrance from any one; for there was neither knight nor fquire of either party who did not find there his equal to fight with, and all were fully engaged. In the end, fir Henry was made prisoner by the lord Montgomery.

You would have feen, in this engagement, fuch knights and fquires as fir Mark Adremench, fir Thomas Avermerfquin, fir William, fir James and fir Alexander Lindfay, the lord Saltoun, fir John Sandilands, fir Patrick Dunbar, fir John and fir Walter Sinclair, fir Patrick Hepburne and his two fons, the lord Montgomery, fir John Meffurel, fir John Gladwin, fir William Redoue, fir William Stuart, fir John Haliburton, fir John Alidier, fir Robert Landre, fir Alexander Ramfay, fir Alexa ander Frazer, fir John Ermoufcon, fir William Varlan, David Fremin, Robert Colomone and his two fons, John and Robert, who were that day knighted, and a hundred other knights and fquires, whose names I cannot remember; but there was not one who did not most gallantly perform his part in this engagement.

On the fide of the English, there were fir Ralph de Longblé, fir Matthew Redman, fir Robert Aveugle, fir Thomas Graty, fir Thomas Helquon, fir Thomas Abreton, fir John de Liebon, fir William Valsincon, the baron de Helcon, fir John de Copledup, sénéschal of York, and many more, who on foot maintained the fight vigorously, both before and after the capture of fir Henry Percy.

The battle was feverely fought on each fide; but, fuch is the fickleness of fortune, that though the English

English were a more numerous body of able men at arms, and at the first onset had repulsed the Scots, they in the end lost the field; and all the above-named knights, except fir Matthew Redman, governor of Berwick, were made prisoners. But he seeing they were defeated without hopes of recovery, and the English slying in all directions, while his brother-knights were surrendering themselves to the Scots, mounted his horse, and rode off.

Just as the defeat took place, and while the combat was continued in different parts, an english fquire, whose name was Thomas Veletem, and attached to the household of lord Percy, was furrounded by a body of Scots. He was a handfome man, and, as he shewed, valiant in arms. He had that and the preceding night been employed in collecting the best arms, and would neither surrender nor deign to fly. It was told me, that he had made a vow to that purpose, and had declared at some feast in Northumberland, that at the very first meeting of the Scots and English, he would acquit himfelf fo loyally that, for having stood his ground, he should be renowned as the best combatant of both parties. I also heard, for I never saw him, that I know of, that his body and limbs were of a strength befitting a vigorous combatant; and he performed fuch deeds of valour, when engaged with the banner of the earl of Moray, as astonished the Scots, but he was flain while thus valiantly fighting. They would willingly have made him a prisoner for his courage; and feveral knights proposed it to him, but in vain, for he thought he should be affifted by his friends.

Thus died Thomas Felton, while engaged with a coufin of the king of Scotland, called Simon Gladwin, much lamented by his party.

According to what I heard, this battle was very bloody from its commencement to the defeat: but when the Scots faw the English were discomfited and furrendering on all sides, they behaved courteously to them, saying, 'Sit down and disarm yourselves, for I am your master,' but never insulted them more than if they had been brothers.

The pursuit lasted a long time, and to the length of five english miles. Had the Scots been in sufficient numbers, none would have escaped death or captivity; and if sir Archibald Douglas, the earl of Fife, the earl of Sutherland, with the division that had marched for Carlisle, had been there, they would have taken the bishop of Durham and the town of Newcastle on Tyne, as I shall explain to you *.

CHAP.

* Through the kindness of my friends at Edinburgh, particularly Dr. Robert Anderson and Walter Scott, Esq. to whom the public are indebted for many instructive and amusing performances, I am enabled to clear up, in some measure, my historian's blunders in the names of the heroes at this celebrated battle, and to add a few more particulars concerning it.

The prefent mansion of Otterbourne, belonging to Mr. Essis of Newcastle, is founded upon the ancient castle or tower which Douglas was besieging when attacked by Percy. The field

CHAP. XLL

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM IS ANXIOUS TO SUCCOUR THE ENGLISH AND RESCUE SIR HENRY PERCY, BUT IS SO BADLY SUPPORTED BY HIS MEN, THAT HE IS FORCED TO RETREAT.—HE MAKES SIR JAMES LINDSAY PEISONER, WHO HAD TAKEN SIR MATTHEW REDMAN.

PHE same evening that sir Henry and sir Ralph Percy had lest Newcastle, the bishop of Durham, with the remainder of the forces of that district, had arrived there and supped. While seated field of battle is ftill called Battle-crofts. There is a croß erected on the fpot where Douglas fell.'

at

See the two ballads on this battle, published by Dr. Percy in his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, and by Walter Scott, Esq. in his Border Minstrelty: from the scots ballad I extract as follows.

Douglas was armed with an iron mace, which few but he could wield, and ruthed into the combat, followed only by his chaplain and his two fquires. Before his followers could come up, their brave leader lay firetched on the ground, with three mortal wounds, and his two fquires dead by his fide: the priest alone, armed with a lance, was protecting his master from farther injury. I do like my forstathers, faid the expiring hero, in a field of battle, and not on a bed of fickness. Conceal my death, defend my standard, and avenge my fall. It is an old.

at table, he confidered that he should not act very honourably if he remained in the town while his countrymen had taken the field. In confequence, he rose from table, ordered his horses to be saddled, and his trumpets to sound for those who had horses old proverb, that a dead man shall gain a field, and I hope it will be accomplished this night."

- 'The banner of Douglas was borne by his natural fon, Archibald Douglas, ancestor of the family of Cavers, hereditary sheriffs of Tiviotdale, amongst whose archieves this glorious relic is still preserved. The earl, at the onset, is faid to have charged his son to defend it to the last drop of his blood.
- ' Hotspur, for his ransom to the lord Montgomery, built the castle of Penoon, in Ayrshire, belonging to the family of Montgomery, now earls of Eglintoun.'

In this ballad, Douglas is faid to have been murdered by one of his own men; and, in the introductory discourse, there seems to have been a traditionary foundation for it, and the very person is named that was supposed to have done the deed; but Mr. Scott rejects this as totally untrue, and arising from the common desire of assigning some remote and extraordinary cause for the death of a great man.

Dr. Percy fays in a note, that 'Otterbourne is near the old watling fireet road, in the parish of Elsdon. The Scots were encamped on a graffy plain near the river Read. The place where the Scots and English fought is still called Battle-riggs.'

Warriors mentioned by Froisfart as engaged at Otterbourne:

- f Sir Robert Avercequi. Erskine. Sir Robert Erskine of Alva was taken at Homeldown.
- ' Sir Marc Ordrennen. A terrible corruption of John Gordon, killed in the battle. Perhaps (like one of his fons) he horses to make themselves ready, and the infantry to be drawn out in array for quitting the place.

&#x27; The two squires of the body to Douglas were Robert Hart and Simon Glendinning: the chaplain, Richard Lundie, after wards archdeacon of Aberdeen.

When they had all left it, they amounted to feven thousand men; that is, two thousand on horse-back and five thousand on foot. Although it was

110W

*

was called familiarly fir Jock Gordon. He was lord of Huntley.

- ' The lord de Sechin. William created lord Seton by Robert III.
- ' Sir John de Sobelans. Sir John Sandilands. He married a daughter of Robert II.
- ' Sir Patrick Schopbone. Sir Patrick Hepburn, lord of Hailes. He repelled the desperate assault made by the English upon the standard of Douglas.
- ' Sir John Malishel. Sir John Maxwell, anciently spelled Maccuswal. He is mentioned in the old ballad in Percy's Reliques.
- ' Sir Adam Gladivin. Glendonwin, or Glendinning as pronounced. He was slain in the battle close to Douglas. His name was Simon, not Adam.
- ' Sir William de Redurin. Perhaps Rutherford, spelled anciently Ridderford of Edgerstone.
- 'Sir William Stanac. Probably Stronach, an ancient fcottish name, or perhaps a blunder for fir Walter Scott, a great warrior, who was assuredly in the engagement. He was killed at Homeldown.
- 6 Sir John de Halpebreton. Sir John Haliburton of Dirleton.
- Sir Alidier Landre. Sir Alexander Lauder of the Bass, a renowned hero.
  - ' Sir William de Morbereth. Sir William Monbray.
- ' Sir Maubert Here. Sir Robert Hart, who was flain beside Douglas. See Barry's Poem.
  - ' Sir William de Waleram. Probably a foreigner.

now night, they took the road toward Otterbourne; but they had not advanced a league from Newcastle before intelligence was brought that the English were engaged with the Scots. On this, the bishop halted his men; and several more joined them,

- ' Sir John Amourstan. Sir John Edmondstoune. It seems very unlikely that Haggerstoune fought on the side of Scotland.
- ' David Filium—is translated by lord Berners, ' Davy his son;' that is, fir John Edmonstoune's. I can think of no scottish name resembling Filium, and none such occurs in the account of the battle given by our historians.
  - Robert Colennie. Perhaps Robert Campbell.
  - " Sir William de Fif. Sir William Fife.
  - ' Compte d'Astroderne. Earl of Stratherne.
  - ' Sir Raoul de Lombre. Sir Ralph Bulmer.
- so Sir Raoul Demeren. I suspect that by one of those inversions which are incident to a person spelling an unknown name from the pronunciation, Froissart may have written de Meren for de Mener, which would give us the name Manners, well known in northern warfare.
- * Sir Robert Angle. Here, I suspect, we have again one of the Langleys. There is not, that I have noticed, a family of Angles in the north of England.
- Sir Thomas Grea. Sir Thomas Gray, ancestor of lord Tankerville.
- ' Sir Thomas Holcon. Holton, or Hilltown, the t and c being eafily miftaken in old MSS.
- <sup>c</sup> Sir John Felcon. Felton. He was high sheriff of Northumberland in the 14th of Richard II. and held by grand sergeantcy the manor of West Matsen.
- ' Sir John de Lierbon. Sir John Lilburne, a great northumbrian warrior.
  - ' Sir William Wanichon. Very likely Widdrington.
  - Sir Thomas Aboiton. Abington, or Boynton.
  - Le Baron de Helcon. William Carnaby was lord of the them, out of breath from the combat. They were asked how the affair went: they replied, 'Badly, and unfortunately: we are defeated, and here are the Scots close at our heels.'

This fecond intelligence, being worse than the first, manor of Hallton and Hallton-tower in 9th of Henry IV. It came into his family by marriage with the heir-female of William de Halton, high fheriff of Northumberland in the 25th of Edward I. See Dugdale, vol. II. p. 92. & Esceat. de anno nono Henrici quarti.

- ' Sir John Colpedie. Copeland.
- ' Sir Aymen d'Alphel. Raymond Delaval.
- ' John Makirel. From his holding under the earl of Moray, and other circumstances, this gallant squire seems to have been John Maxwell; that name being anciently spessed, and perhaps pronounced Maccuswal: an  $\int$  exchanged of r would make Maccural.
- ' William de Norbenick. William of North Berwick. Major, speaking of this valiant priest, says, that the chaplain of every scottish baron fought by his side.
- ' Meffire Marc Adremench. Sir Malcolm Drummond.—Three years before the battle, he had 400 livres out of the money brought over by John de Vienne.
- ' Mess. Thomas Avremesquin. Sir Thomas Erskine, ancestor of the family of Mar.
- ' Le feigneur de Saulcon. William de Abernethy, lord of Saltoun in East Lothian.
  - ' Sir John Saintdelanx. A various spelling of Sandelands.
- ' Sir John Messurel. Either John Maxwell before mentioned, or John Marshal.
- ' Mess. John Gladwin. We have no such scottish name as Gladwin. Barry mentions a young knight, named Gledstane, as having fallen.
  - ' Mess. William de Redone. Perhaps William de Riddel.
  - ' Mess. John Alidier. Sir John of Lauder, quasi a Lauder.

first, gave the alarm to several, who broke from their ranks; and when, shortly after, crowds came to them slying like men deseated, they were panicstruck, and so frightened with the bad news, that the bishop of Durham could not retain sive hundred of his men together.

- · Meff. John Ermoufcon. Sir John Armstrong.
- 4 Mest. William Varlan. Sir William Wardlaw.
- · David Fremin. David Fleming.
- 4 Robert Colomme. Perhaps Campbell.

'ENGLISH.

- " Raoul de Longblé. Ralph de Langley, a powerful family in Northumberland, long lords of Langley Castle.
  - ' Robert Aveugle. Robert of Ogle.
- 4 Thomas Graty. Either Gray or Thomas of Grayflock; the former most likely.
  - ' Thomas Hellquon. Hilltor, Halltown or Hatton.
  - ' Thomas Abretown. Thomas Abington.
  - John Liebon. John Lilburn, above mentioned.
  - 4 Thomas Valfincon. William Walfingham.
  - 4 Le baron de Helcon. The lord of Halltown.
- ' Sir John de Colpedup. Sir John Copeland of Copeland Caftle in Northumberland.
- 'Thomas Veleton. Thomas Felton. The prowess of this squire seems to have given rise to the story of Weddrington in Chevy Chace.
- * Froissart does not mention John Swinton of Swinton, who made a great figure at the battle of Otterbourne, and was the same person who sought with the French at the barriers of the town of Noyon, in fir Robert Knolles' expedition in 1370, called by Froissart Assueton,' and which I translated Seton, the Minstrelfy of the Borders not being then published. This here was slain at the battle of Homeldown.'

&#x27; Meff. Robert Landre. Sir Robert Lundie, famed for his courage in the battle.

Now, supposing a large body had come upon them and followed them in their slight (with the addition of its being night), to regain the town, would not there have been much mischief? for those acquainted with arms imagine the alarm would have been so great, that the Scots would have forced their way into the place with them.

When the bishop of Durham, who was eager to reinforce the English, faw his own men thus join the runaways in their slight, he demanded from sir William de Lussy*, fir Thomas Clissord and other knights of his company, what they were now to do? These knights could not, or would not advise him: for to return without having done any thing would be dishonourable, and to advance seemed attended with danger, they therefore remained silent; but the longer they waited; the more their men decreased in numbers.

The bishop at length said,—' Gentlemen, every thing considered, there is no honour in sool-hardiness, nor is it requisite that to one missortune we add another: we hear and see that our men are defeated: this we cannot remedy; for, should we attempt to reinforce them, we scarcely know whither we should go, nor what numbers the enemy consist of. We will return this night to Newcastle, and to-morrow re-assemble and march to find our enemies.' They replied, 'God assist us in it!'— Upon this they marched back to Newcastle.

* De Luffy. Q. Lucy.

Observe the consequences of this alarm; for had they remained steady in a body, as they had left Newcastle, and forced the runaways to return with them, they must have defeated the Scots, which was the opinion of many. But it was not to be so, and the Scots remained victorious.

I will fay fomething of fir Matthew Redman, who had mounted his horse to escape from the battle, as he alone could not recover the day. On his departure, he was noticed by fir James Lindfay, a valiant fcots knight, who was near him, and, through courage and the hope of gain, was defirous of purfuing him. His horfe was ready, and leaping on him with his battle-axe hung at his neck, and spear in hand, galloped after him, leaving his men and the battle, and came fo close to him, that he might, had he chofen, have hit him with his lance; but he faid,—' Ha, fir knight, turn about: it is difgraceful thus to fly: I am James Lindfay; and, if you do not turn, I will drive my spear into your back.' Sir Matthew made no reply, but stuck spurs harder into his horse than before. state did the chace last for three miles, when fir Matthew's horse stumbling under him, he leaped off, drew his fword from the fcabbard, and put himself in a posture of defence. The scots knight made a thrust at him with his lance, thinking to strike him on the breast; but sir Matthew, by writhing his body, escaped the blow, and the point of the lance was buried in the ground, and there remained fixed. Sir Matthew now stepped forward, and with his fword cut the spear in two.

Sir James Lindfay, finding he had loft his lance, flung the shaft on the ground, and, dismounting, grasped his battle-axe, which was slung across his shoulder, and handled it with one hand very dexterously, for the Scots are accustomed thus to use it, attacking the knight with renewed courage, who defended himself with much art. They pursued each other for a long time, one with the battle-axe and the other with the sword, for there was no one to prevent them; but, at last, fir James laid about him such heavy blows, that sir Matthew was quite out of breath, which made him surrender; and he said, 'Lindsay, I yield myself to you.'

'Indeed!' replied the fcots knight, 'refcued or not.' 'I confent,' faid fir Matthew: 'you will take good care of me.' 'That I will,' answered fir James. Sir Matthew on this put his sword in the scabbard, and faid, 'Now, what do you require of me, for I am your prisoner by fair conquest?' 'And what is it you would wish me to do?' replied fir James. 'I should like,' answered fir Matthew, 'to return to Newcastle; and, within fifteen days, I will come to you in any part of Scotland you shall appoint.' 'I agree,' faid fir James, 'on your pledging yourself, that within three weeks you be in Edinburgh; and wherever you may go, you acknowledge yourself as my prisoner.'

Sir Matthew having fworn to observe these conditions, each sought his horse, that was pasturing hard by, and, having mounted, took leave and departed, fir James by the way he had come, to join his countrymen, and fir Matthew to Newcastle.

T 2 parted.

Sir James, from the darkness of the night, as the moon did not shine very clear, mistook his road, and had not advanced half a league before he fell in with the bishop of Durham and more than five hundred English: he might have escaped this danger had he chosen it, but he thought they were his friends in purfuit of the enemy. When in the midst of them, those nearest asked who he was. He replied, 'I am fir James Lindfay.' Upon this, the bishop, who was within hearing, pushed forward and faid, 'Lindfay, you are taken: furrender yourfelf to me.' 'And who are you?' faid Lindfay. 'I am the bishop of Durham.' 'And where do you come from?' added Lindfay. 'By my faith, friend, I intended being at the battle, but unfortunately was too late; and in despair I am returning to Newcastle, whither you will accompany me.' 'If you infift on it, I must comply,' anfwered fir James; 'but I have made a prisoner, and am now one myfelf: fuch is the chance of war.' Whom have you taken?' asked the bishop. have captured and ranfomed, after a long purfuit, fir Matthew Redman.' 'And where is he?' faid the bishop. 'On my faith,' replied fir James, he is returned to Newcastle: he entreated I would allow him three weeks liberty, which I complied with.' 'Well, well,' faid the bishop, 'let us get on to Newcastle, where you shall converse with him.

Thus they returned to Newcastle, sir James Lindfay as prisoner to the bissiop of Durham. Under the banner of the earl of March, a squire of Gascony, John de Châteauneuf, was made prisoner, as was his companion, John de Cauteron, under the banner of the earl of Moray.

CHAP. XLII.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM MARCHES ON THE MOR-ROW OF THE BATTLE TO THE SCOTS CAMP, BUT RETIRES WITHOUT DARING TO ATTACK IT.—THE SCOTS RETURN TO THEIR OWN COUNTRY.

BEFORE the dawn of day, the field was clear of combatants. The Scots had retired within their camp, and had fent fcouts and parties of light horse towards Newcastle and on the adjacent roads, to observe whether the English were collecting in any large bodies, that they might not a second time be surprised.

This was wifely done; for when the bishop of Durham was returned to Newcastle, and had disarmed himself at his lodgings, he was very melancholy at the unfortunate news he had heard, that his cousins, the sons of the earl of Northumberland, and all the knights who had followed them, were either taken or slain. He sent for all knights and squires at the time in Newcastle, and demanded if they would suffer things to remain in their present state, for that they would be disgraced should they return without ever seeing their enemies.— They held a council, and determined to arm themselves by sun-rise, and to march horse and soot after the Scots to Otterbourne and offer them battle. This resolution was published throughout the town, and the trumpets sounded at the appointed hour.

The whole army made themselves ready, and were drawn up before the bridge. About sun-rise they left Newcastle, through the gate leading to Berwick, and followed the road to Otterbourne. They amounted in the whole, including horse and foot, to ten thousand men.

They had not advanced two leagues before it was fignified to the Scots, that the bishop of Durham had rallied his troops and was on his march to give them battle. This was likewise confirmed by their scouts, who brought the same intelligence.

Sir Matthew Redman, on his return to Newcastle, told the event of the battle, and of his being made prisoner by sir James Lindsay, and learnt, to his surprise, from the bishop, or from some of his people, that sir James had in his turn been taken by the bishop. As soon, therefore, as the bishop had quitted Newcastle, sir Matthew went to his lodgings in search of his master, whom he found very melancholy, looking out of a window. 'What has brought you here, fir James?' was the first safute of fir Matthew. Sir James, interrupting his melancholy thoughts, advanced to meet him, bade him good day, and replied,—' By my faith, Redman, ill luck; for I had no fooner parted with you, and was returning home, than I fell in with the bishop of Durham, to whom I am prisoner, in like manner as you are to me. I believe there will be no need of your coming to Edinburgh to obtain your ransom, for we may finish the business here if my master consent to it.'

'We shall soon agree as to that,' replied Redman; 'but you must come and dine with me; for the bishop and his men have marched to attack your countrymen. I know not what success they will have, nor shall we be informed till their return.' I accept your invitation,' answered Lindsay. In such manner did these two enjoy each other's company in Newcastle.

The barons and knights of Scotland, on being informed of the bishop of Durham's approach with ten thousand men, held a council, whether to march away or abide the event. On mature confideration, they resolved on the latter, from the disticulty of finding so strong a position to defend themselves and guard their prisoners, of whom they had many. These they could not carry away with them, on account of the wounded, nor were they willing to leave them behind. They formed themselves in a strong body, and had fortisted their camp in such manner that it could be entered by only one pass. They then made their prisoners fwear, that rescued or not they would acknowledge themselves prisoners.

When this was all done, they ordered their minstrels to play as merrily as they could. The Scots have a custom, when assembled in arms, for those who are on foot to be well dressed, each having a large horn slung round his neck, in the manner of hunters, and when they blow all together, the horns being of different sizes, the noise is so great it may be heard four miles off, to the great dismay of their enemies and their own delight. The scots commanders ordered this fort of music now to be played.

The bishop of Durham with his banner, under which were at least ten thousand men, had scarcely approached within a league of the Scots, when they began to play such a concert, that it seemed as if all the devils in hell had come thither to join in the noise, so that those of the English who had never before heard such, were much frightened. This concert lasted a considerable time, and then ceased. After a pause, when they thought the English were within half a league, they recommenced it, continuing it as long as before, when it again ceased.

The bishop, however, kept advancing with his men in battle-array until they came within fight of the enemy, two bow-shots off: the Scots then began to play louder than before, and for a longer time, during which the bishop examined with furprise how well they had chosen their encampment, and strengthened it to their advantage. Some knights held a council how they should act, and it seemed that, after much deliberation, they thought it not advisable to risk an attack, for there were greater chances of loss than gain, but determined to return again to Newcastle.

The Scots, perceiving the English were retreating, and that there was no appearance of any battle, retired within their camp to refresh themselves with meat and liquor. They then made preparations for departure: but because fir Ralph Percy had been dangerously wounded, he begged of his master to allow him to return to Newcastle, or wherever else in Northumberland he might have his wounds better attended to, and remain there until cured; and in case this favour was granted him, as soon as he should be able to mount a horse, he pledged to surrender himself at Edinburgh, or in any other part of Scotland.

The earl of Moray, under whose banner he had been taken, readily affented to this request, and had a litter prepared for him. In a similar manner, several knights and squires obtained their liberty, fixing on a time to return in person to those who had captured them, or to send the amount of their ransoms*.

I was

* The ranfoms were estimated at 200,000 francs. Robert III. granted to Henry Presson, for the redemption of Ralph Percy, the lands and barony of Frondin, Aberdeenshire, the

I was told by those who were of the victorious party, that at this battle, which was fought in the year of grace 1388, between Newcastle and Otterbourne, on the 19th day of August, there were taken or lest dead on the field, on the side of the English, one thousand and forty men of all descriptions; in the pursuit, eighteen hundred and forty, and more than one thousand wounded. Of the Scots, there were only about one hundred slain, and two hundred made prisoners.

As the English were flying, they at times rallied, and returned to combat those who were pursuing them, whenever they thought they had a favourable opportunity, and it was thus their loss was so considerable in the pursuit. You may judge from the number of killed and prisoners on each side, if this battle was not hardily fought.

When every thing had been arranged, and the dead bodies of the earl of Douglas, fir Robert Hart and fir Simon Glendinning were inclosed within coffins, and placed on cars, they began their march, carrying with them fir Henry Percy and upwards of forty english knights. They took the road to Melrose on the Tweed, and on their departure they set fire to their huts. They lodged this night in England without any opposition, and the town of Fyvie and place thereof, the town of Meikle Gad-, dies, the five-mark land of Parkhill. Scots Cal. f. 104.— Froitfart apparently errs in the name of his captor; yet Mar had 201. a year for a third of it, the whole exceeding 6001.— Pinkerton's High. of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 41. note.

on the morrow decamped very early and arrived at Melrofe, which is an abbey of black monks, fituated on the borders of the two kingdoms.

They there halted, and gave directions to the friars for the burial of the earl of Douglas, whose obsequies were very reverently performed on the fecond day after their arrival. His body was placed in a tomb of stone, with the banner of Douglas fuspended over it. Of this earl of Douglas, God fave his foul! there was no iffue, nor do I know who fucceeded to the estate of Douglas; for when I, the author of this history, was in Scotland, at his caftle of Dalkeith, during the lifetime of earl William, there were only two children, a boy and a girl. There were enow of the name of Douglas; for I knew five handsome brothers, squires, of this name, at the court of king David of Scotland, who were the children of a knight called fir James Douglas *. The earl's arms, of three oreilles gules on a field or, descended to them; but I am ignorant to whom fell the land. You must know, that

* Earl James Douglas married the lady Isabella Stuart, daughter of king Robert II. and, dying without lawful iffue, was succeeded by his brother, Archibald lord Galloway, called Archibald the Grim. This last was the issue of earl William's second marriage with Margaret, daughter of Patrick earl of March.—Crawfurd's Peerage of Scotland.

† These arms, according to Crawfurd, must be wrong; for, in his Peerage, the arms are described as, 'Four coats quarterly; 1. azure, a lion rampant, crowned with an imperial crown, or; 2. or, a lion rampant gules, surmounted of a rib-that the fir Archibald Douglas whom I have often mentioned as a gallant knight, and one much feared by the English, was a bastard.

When they had finished the business which had brought them to Melrose, they departed, each to his own country; and those who had prisoners carried them with them, or ransomed them before they left Melrose. In this matter, the English sound the Scots very courteous and accommodating, which pleased them much, as I learnt at the castle of the count de Foix from John de Châteauneus, who had been made prisoner under the banner of the earl of March and Dunbar: he praised the earl exceedingly for his generosity in allowing him to fix his ransom at his pleasure.

Thus did these men at arms separate, having very soon and handsomely settled the amount of the ransoms for their prisoners, who by degrees returned to their homes. It was told me, and I believe it, that the Scots gained two hundred thousand francs from the ransoms, and that never since the battle of Bannockburn, when the Bruce, sir William Douglas, sir Robert de Versy and sir Si-bon fable; 3. or, a fesse cheque, azure and argent, furmounted of a bend fable, charged with five buckles, or; 4. argent, three pyles gules, over all, in a shield of pretence argent, a heart, gules, ensigned with an imperial crown, or, on a chief azure, three mollets of the first, supported on the dexter with a savage, wreathed about the loins with laurel, and on the sinister by a stag proper: crest, a salamander, vomiting fire: motto, Jamais arriere, all within a compartment of stakes impaled.'

mon Frazer purfued the English for three days, have they had so complete nor so gainful a victory.

When the news of it was brought to fir Archibald Douglas, the earls of Fife and Sutherland, before Carlifle, where they were with the larger division of the army, they were greatly rejoiced, but at the same time vexed that they had not been present. They held a council, and determined to retreat into Scotland since their companions had already marched thisher. In consequence, they broke up their camp, and re-entered Scotland.

We will now leave the English and Scots, and speak of the young king of France, and the large army he marched into Germany to revenge himself on the duke of Gueldres.

CHAP. XLIII.

THE KING OF FRANCE ENTERS THE DUCHY OF LUXEMBOURG, ON HIS MARCH TO GUELDRES.—THE DUKE OF JULIERS, FATHER OF THE DUKE OF GUELDRES, MAKES EXCUSES FOR HIS SON TO THE KING OF FRANCE.—HE IS GRACIOUSLY RECEIVED, AND HAS THE TERRITORY OF VIERSON RESTORED TO HIM, FOR WHICH HE PAYS HOMAGE TO THE KING.

WHEN the king of France and his army had croffed the Meufe at the bridge of Morfay*, they took the road to the Ardennes and bishoprick of Luxembourg, and had always in advance a large body of pioneers to clear the bushes, and level the roads. The king's army was very numerous, and well appointed. The duke of Juliers and his subjects much dreaded their approach, for they knew they should be first attacked, and the country of Juliers is so level that the men at arms would in one day despoil the whole, excepting a few castles and towns which would perhaps make some little resistance, but they could not hold out long.

* Morfay. Q. Moufon, or Mezieres.

The king of France entered Luxembourg, and was lodged for two days at the monastery where duke Winceslaus of Brabant had been buried. At his departure, he took the road to Bastogne*, and encamped at the distance of a league from where the duchefs of Brabant was lodged. The duchefs had notified to the duke of Burgundy her arrival at Bastogne, who waited on her, and conducted her to the king's tent. The king received her very kindly; and, after they had converfed fome time together, she returned to Bastogne, escorted by sir John de Vienne and fir Guy de la Trimouille. On the morrow, the king continued his march until he arrived on the borders of Germany ready to enter Juliers. But, before he had advanced fo far, Arnold bishop of Liege had waited on him, and had exerted himself much to exculpate the duke of Juliers, and to foften the anger the king of France bore him, as father to the duke of Gueldres, and had faid to the king and his uncles, that with regard to the imprudent and outrageous challenge the duke of Gueldres had fent to France, he had never confulted his father on the fubject, nor informed him of it until it was done, and therefore his territories ought not to fuffer for it.

These excuses, however, were not agreeable to the king nor to his uncles; and it was their intention, that unless the duke of Juliers came in perfon, and made a more satisfactory apology, putting himself totally in the king's mercy, he and his country should be the first to pay for it.

* Bastogne, or Bastognack, is a small town in the duchy of Luxembourg: it was formerly more considerable, and called the Paris of the Ardennes.

The bishop of Liege, the barons of Hasbain*, and the magistrates from the principal towns, who had accompanied the bishop, now offered the king and his uncles a free entrance for their army into their country, to pass and repass, and refresh themselves with provision on paying for it, and to remain there, if they so pleased.

The king and his uncles thanked them for their offer, which they did not refuse, as they were ignorant how affairs would turn out. The bishop returned to the duke of Juliers and archbishop of Cologne, and told them all that had passed, that they might consider of it.

The duke of Juliers was very much alarmed left his country should be ruined, and fent for all those knights that were dependent on him, to have their advice, for the French were daily approaching.—The lord de Coucy commanded the vanguard, of one thousand spears; and with him were the duke of Lorraine and the viscount de Meaux, with about two hundred lances more.

When the French were near the borders of Germany, they marched in a more compact body, and took great precautions in their encampments; for a body of three hundred Linfars, from the oppofite fide of the Rhine, had collected together on their line of march. These are the greatest robbers and plunderers in the world; and they hovered alongfide the french army, to take advantage of any negligence on their part. The French were fuspicious of them, and dared not attempt foraging but in large bodies. I believe the lord Boucicaut, the elder, and fir Lewis de Grach were made prisoners by them, and carried to Nimeguen.-These Germans rode through bye ways, and, like birds of prey, night and morning fell upon the French wherever they found a favourable opportunity; and this had made them more careful.

* Hasbain, a small territory in the circle of Westphalia: it forms the principal part of the bishoprick of Liege.

When the king of France was come to the confines of Juliers, and the vanguard and foragers had already entered it, the duke, unwilling that his country should be destroyed, listened to the advice of the archbishop of Cologne and bishop of Liege, and confented they should negotiate with the king and his uncles, and entreat that his country should remain in peace, on fuch terms as I shall mention.

These two prelates, having laid the foundation for a peace, conducted the duke of Juliers into the king's presence, who was attended by his uncles, the duke of Lorraine and other great barons of France of the blood royal, and his council. the duke's approaching the king, he cast himself on his knees, and made very handsome excuses for the challenge his fon had fent to France. He told the king, that his fon was a madman; that he had U

Vol. IX.

never

never consulted him respecting this challenge, nor indeed in any thing else, but always acted for himfelf. He offered his services to the king, and said,—' My lord, with your permission, I will go to him, and sharply remonstrate with him on his follies, and order him to come and make his apology to you and to your council. If he resuse to follow my advice, and continue to act from his own headstrong will, I offer to give you possession of all my inclosed towns and castles, for you to garrison with men at arms, and carry on the war against him until he shall submit himself to your mercy.'

The king, on this, looked at his brother, his uncles and council, as it feemed to him, and to many who were prefent, a very fair offer. He made the duke rife, who had hitherto continued on his knees, and faid,—' We will confider what you have offered, and the promifes you make us.'

The duke, having rifen, remained with the two prelates who had brought him thither; and the king retired with his uncles and privy counfellors, to discuss the proposal that had been made them.

This council lasted some time, and various propositions were made, each pressing his different plan. The duke of Burgundy was the most active, as indeed the matter more essentially affected hint, on account of his being heir, in right of his duchess, to the succession of the duchess of Brabant, and it was in truth owing to him that the king had undertaken this expedition. He was therefore very anxious that the quarrel should be amicably terminated, and a solid peace established between all parties, that there might not be any necessity for renewing the war; for the distance was great for the king and lords, besides being very expensive, and heavy on the kingdom.

After feveral had given their opinions, he addressed himself to the king, to the duke of Berry, and to all prefent, faying,- 'My lord, and you brother of Berry and gentlemen of the council, whatever is rafhly or inconfiderately begun generally ends badly. We have heard our coufin, the duke of Juliers, excuse himself handsomely, and we have heard the offer he has made, that his fon fhall do fo likewife: he is of that gallantry and birth, being connected with me by blood, that we ought to believe what he has faid. He offers to the king his person, his country, his towns and castles, in case his son shall continue obstinate, and refuse to make any apology for his rash challenge. If we have the duke of Juliers on our fide, the duke of Gueldres, whom we want to punish, will be so much the more weakened, that he will the more dread us, and the fooner bend to our will. I therefore advise that the excuses of the duke of Juliers and his offer be accepted, for he has greatly humbled himself; and the archbishop of Cologne, the bishop of Liege, with other potent barons, entreat likewise that this may be done.'

No one making any reply, it was unanimously agreed to; and the archbishop and bishop, who had opened the negotiation, were called in. They were told very minutely every act the duke of Juliers was to swear to perform, if he were desirous his country should remain in peace. First, that he should go himself, or fend to his son, the duke of Gueldres, to remonstrate with him on his folly and impertinence, in fending fo unufual and rude a challenge to fo powerful a prince as the king of France, and oblige him to come perfonally and fubmit himfelf to the mercy of the king, if he did not fatisfactorily excuse himself. Should the duke of Gueldres refuse compliance, through pride and weakness of understanding, and persist in his opinion, then the duke of Juliers was to engage, on his oath, not to afford him the least support, but, on the contrary, to unite himself with his enemies, and to affift the army of the king, which, during the enfuing winter, would be quartered throughout the country of Juliers, in order to be ready to carry on the war against the duke of Gueldres; and all towns and castles, belonging to the duke of Juliers, shall receive, on the most friendly footing, the men at arms of France.

U 2 his

These two prelates, who had been solely called to the council to remonstrate touching these matters with the duke of Juliers, repeated to him what they had heard, adding such weighty reasons, that the duke assented to the terms: indeed, he saw he must do so, if he wished to preserve his country from ruin. He therefore solemnly swore to observe faithfully all the articles of the treaty, and to remain a firm friend to the king and to his uncles, for which his duchy was saved from being despoiled: but forage, of which there was enough, was completely given up to the French.

Thus did the duke of Juliers become liege man to the king of France, and paid homage for the territory of Vierfon, fituated between Blois and Berry. He supped that night with the king: it was on a Thursday; and there were feated at the king's table, first, the bishop of Liege, the archbishop of Cologne, the king, the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Touraine, the duke of Juliers and the duke of Bourbon.

CHAP. XLIV.

EXENG CHARLES VI. QUARTERS HIS ARMY, ON A FRIEND LY FOOTING, IN THE DUCHY OF JULIERS.—A SQUIRE OF AUVERGNE IS MURDERED BY A WOOD-CUTTER WHOM HE IS LEADING AWAY AS HIS PRISONER.

SUCH was the conclusion of the treaties between the king of France and the duke of Juliers, by which the last enjoyed peace, although the king quartered himself and his army in his duchy, which he found a rich country, and full of every kind of provision.

The duke of Juliers went to his son, but not immediately, and in the interval some gallant seats of arms were done; for the Germans were so eager of gain, that they frequently, during the night, or at very early morn, beat up the quarters of the French: fometimes they got the advantage, at other times they were made prisoners; but for one German that was taken, they made four Frenchmen prisoners in return. In consequence, the constable of France, the lord de Coucy, the duke of Lorraine, the marshal de Blainville, sir John de Vienne and the lord de la Trimouille, assembled their men, to the amount of about four thousand men at arms, and marched toward a town in Gueldres called Remogne*, and drew up in handsome array before it.

At this time the duke of Gueldres was within it, and thought highly of their appearance; but he made no fally against them, for his force was not equal to attempt it, which vexed him much. The french men at arms remained four hours drawn up in order of battle before the place; but when they faw that none came out to oppose them, they retreated to their quarters.

It happened that this same evening several knights and squires assembled at the lodgings of the duke of Berry, with the intent of making an excursion on the morrow into the enemy's country in search of adventures. They each, to the amount of about one hundred lances, pledged themselves to this; but, when the morning came, the project was broken off. A squire from Auvergne, called Godinos, a valiant man at arms, and serving under the banner of the lord d'Alégre, finding this excursion laid aside, was much vexed thereat; and, speaking of it to some of his companions of as good courage as himself, they collected about thirty spears, and rode out that morning, but met with no adventure.

* Remogne. Q.

Godinos was fo defirous of feats of arms, that he felt forely the disappointment of returning without having struck a blow, and faid to his companions,- 'Do you ride on gently, while I and my page will skirt this wood, to see if there be any ambuscades, or any persons within it, and wait for me at the foot of yonder hill.' Having affented to this, Godinos and his page left them, and rode alongfide the wood. They had not advanced far, when he heard some one whiftle: he instantly stuck fpurs into his horse, and came to a hollow road, where he found a Gueldrelander fquaring timber. Godinos feized his spear, and charged the man full gallop, to his great aftonishment, and made figns to him to follow him; for he faid to himfelf,- At least, I shall show to my companions, that I have done fomething by making this man my prisoner, and he may be of some use to us in our quarters.

He now fet out on his return, riding on a small hackney, followed by the woodman on foot, with a large axe on his shoulder with which he had been working. The page of Godinos was behind, mounted on his courser, bearing his helmet and dragging his lance, half asleep from having left his bed too early. The German, who knew not whither he was going, nor what might be done to him, thought he might as well attempt to escape: he therefore advanced close to Godinos, and with his uplifted axe smote him such a blow on the head as split his skull to the teeth, and laid him dead on the ground. The page, from his distance and sleepiness, neither saw nor heard any thing of the matter; and the peasant ran to hide himself in the wood, from which he was not far off.

Those who heard of this unfortunate accident were much distressed; for Godinos was well beloved by all who knew him, particularly by his countrymen in Auvergne, for he was the man at arms most dreaded by the English, and the person who had done them most mischief. He would never have been suffered to remain a prisoner, though twenty thousand francs had been asked for his ransom.

We will now return to the duke of Juliers.

CHAP. XLV.

THE DUKE OF JULIERS AND ARCHBISHOP OF CO-LOGNE LEAVE THE KING OF FRANCE, AND GO TO THE DUKE OF GUELDRES AT NIMEGUEN.—BY THEIR REMONSTRANCES AND NEGOTIATIONS, HE OBTAINS PEACE WITH THE KING OF FRANCE AND DUCHESS OF BRABANT.

YOU have before heard how the duke of Juliers made his peace with the king of France, through the mediation of the two prelates already mentioned and the duke of Lorraine his coufin, who had taken great pains in the business, and gone to seek him in the town of Atdeke*, whence he had brought him, with the archbishop of Cologne, to a conference with the king of France and his uncles. The duke had then promised to oblige his son, the duke of Gueldres, to submit himself to the king, otherwise he was to unite with the king in his war against him. These terms he was forced to comply with, or his duchy would have been destroyed.

The duke of Juliers, having made his prepara-

* Atdeke, Q.

tions, fet out with the archbishop of Cologne for Gueldres, and, having crossed the river Waal, arrived at Nimeguen, where the duke of Gueldres then resided. He received them most affectionately, as was but right, for what tie is nearer than that of father or mother. He had before heard that the duke of Juliers had made his peace with the king of France, which was not very pleasing to him, but he had no occasion to shew his dislike to it.

The duke of Juliers and the archbishop remonstrated with him for some time on the situation he and his country were in. At first, he paid not any attention; for he had so strongly connected himself with the king of England he could not immediately break it off, nor had he any inclination so to do, for his heart was devoted to the English.

He argued the matter with them obstinately, declaring he would abide the event; and if, from the arrival of the king of France with an army, he should suffer any loss, he was young, and might at other times revenge himself on France or on the Brabanters their allies; adding, that in war the chances are uncertain, and no prince can undertake one without expecting loss as well as gain.

This language greatly enraged the duke of Juliers, who faid, 'William, how will you carry on this war? and from whom do you expect compensation for your losses?' 'The king of England and his power,' replied he; 'and I am very much astonished I have had no intelligence of their fleet; for if they had kept their engagement, by which they were to come hither, I would more than once have beaten up the french quarters.' 'Do you wait for them, William?' asked the duke of Juliers. ' The English have so much on their hands at this moment, they cannot give you any affiftance. There is our coufin, the duke of Lancaster, at Bayonne, who has left Castille with the shattered remains of his army, having loft the greater part by fickness, and by that the season for making war. He is foliciting reinforcements of men at arms and archers from England, but will not obtain twenty fpears. On the other hand, the English have lately experienced a fevere overthrow in battle with the Scots near Newcastle on Tyne, in Northumberland, in which all the chivalry of the north have been made prisoners or flain. England, besides, is not unanimous in their affection to the king: you will therefore act wifely not to depend on the English at this moment, for you will not have affistance from them, nor from any other quarter. I would therefore advise that you fuffer us to manage for you, and we will pacify the king of France, and make up this quarrel without your being diffiqnoured or a lofer from it.'

'My lord,' answered the duke of Gueldres, how can I with honour accommodate my difference with the king of France? Were I to have my country ruined, and be forced to go and live elsewhere, I would not do it: I am too strongly bound to the king of England; and for him have I defied the king of France. Do you think,' added he, 'that for his menaces I will recal my word, or break break my engagement? You only wish my difgrace. I entreat you, therefore, to leave me to mysels: I will make head against the French, for their threats do not alarm me. The rain, wind and cold weather will make war for me; and, before the month of January be arrived, they will be so tired and worn down, that the boldest among them will wish to be at home.'

Neither the duke of Juliers nor the archbishop of Cologne could, at this first interview, prevail on the duke of Gueldres to change his resolution, though they were fix days labouring at it, and daily in council. At length the duke of Juliers, sinding his arguments of no avail, was so angry, as to say to him, 'that if he did not pay more attention to his advice, he would displease him greatly, insomuch that he should never inherit one soot of his duchy of Juliers, which he would dispose of to another, who should be powerful enough to defend it against him;' adding, 'that none but a fool refused counsel.'

The duke of Gueldres, feeing his father inflamed with passion, replied, by way of softening matters,— Advise me then how with honour I may act; and since you desire it, from my love to you, I will pay attention to it; for I assuredly owe you all obedience, and shall never in that be wanting. — Now,' faid the duke of Juliers, 'you speak well and to the purpose, and we will consider the matter.'

It was then determined, after many and long confultations, that the duke of Gueldres should wait wait on the king of France, and pay him the honour and respect besitting so great a prince, and should excuse himself for having sent him such a challenge, in fimilar words to thefe,- ' My lord, it is very true that a letter, fealed with my fignet, was fent into France and delivered to you, in which was contained a challenge drawn up in very outrageous term's, and contrary to fuch as are generally used in the like cases, when princes or lords defy each other; but this I disavow, as never having been uttered from my mouth, nor written by my commands, as I would be far from defaming your name or rank. For the confirmation of what I now fay, and to remove all doubts, I must inform you, that, at the defire of my much-redoubted lord, the king of England, and his council, with whom I have entered into very close alliance, I fent to England four of my knights, to whom I intrusted my fignet, for them to seal whatever might be required of them. They were to write and feal, and not I: so that I never knew the contents of the letter fent to France until it had been fealed. Be pleafed, therefore, to accept of this as my apology, for it is the truth. With regard to my oath of allegiance to my redoubted lord, the king of England, I am refolved to adhere to it. and to obey, as far as in me lies, whatever he may command, whether to challenge you, and affemble my forces, wherever he may please, to oppose you or any other prince, excepting my natural lord, the emperor of Germany; for to him I have perfonally fworn my homage in the fullest manner. But out of respect and honour to you, and as some rescompense for the trouble and charges you have had, in coming to this distance, to learn the truth of this challenge, I am willing to swear, and that oath I will punctually keep, that, henceforward, I will never make any war upon you nor your kingdom without having first given you one year's notice of my intention; and, my lord, I hope you will think this sufficient.'

The duke of Gueldres replied, that all this he would willingly fay; for it did not feem to him to convey any thing blameable or dishonourable.

Upon this being fettled, the duke of Juliers and the archbishop departed, and returned to Juliers, and thence to Endesker*. At a proper season they waited on the king of France, and related to him and his uncles every particular which had passed between them and the duke of Gueldres; and, that the matter might be immediately considered, they added, there could not any thing more be obtained from his son.

The king of France was so desirous to see his cousin the duke of Gueldres, who had given him such trouble, that he assented to the terms of the treaty. The duke of Burgundy was also anxious that the territories of the duches of Brabant should remain in peace, and took pains that this treaty should be agreed to, and that the duke of Gueldres, on the strength of it, should come to them.

* Endeiker. Q.

There was also another reason for their consenting to it: winter was approaching, and the nights were already cold and long. The french lords were told that Gueldres was a miserable country to winter in; and they daily received information of losses of knights, squires and horses, that had been captured by the ambushes of these Linsars.

From all these reasons, matters were so far concluded that the duke of Gueldres came to the french camp, and was introduced by the duke of Juliers his father, the duke of Lorraine his coufin, and the archbishop of Cologne, to the king's tent. There were prefent, at this interview, the king's uncles, his brother the duke of Touraine, the duke of Bar, the count de la Marche, the count de St. Pol, the count dauphin d'Auvergne, the lord de Coucy and the constable of France. On his entrance, the duke of Gueldres cast himself on his knees before the king; but I heard that the king made him rife, (in this matter, however, I know nothing but what I learnt from others), and that he boldly excufed himfelf for the challenge, in the terms you have before heard. The king accepted his apology; and he then declared, on his oath. that if he were ever again to challenge or make war on France, he would fend notice of it one year beforehand. Thus did Gueldres and Brabant remain in a fecure state, and those who had expected the most were the greatest losers.

Every thing being now fettled, the duke of Gueldres supped with the king of France at his table; and I must say he was much looked at, for the great plague he had given them. These treaties were fairly written and fealed; and, when all was done, the lords took leave of each other: but, before the duke of Gueldres departed, he requested that the prisoners the French had made in this war might be given up, which was agreed to in the manner he defired. The king of France demanded that all prisoners made from him should likewise be fet at liberty; but the duke of Gueldres excufed himfelf, faying,- My lord, that cannot be done : I am a poor man, and when I heard of your march hither, I strengthened myself as much as possible with knights from the other fide of the Rhine and elfewhere, agreeing with them, that every thing they might take should be their own property. is not possible for me, therefore, to despoil them of what I have given, nor have I the power fo to do; and, fhould I attempt it, they would make war upon Be pleafed, therefore, to let this matter remain as it is, for I cannot remedy it.'

The king, perceiving he could not obtain any thing more, bore it as well as he could, without adding a word in reply, and comforted himself on the greatness of his power that could enrich so many poor persons. They took leave of each other mutually satisfied, and orders were given for the army to march back to France. It was said, the king would hold the feast of All-saints in the city of Rheims.

I will now fay a word of the english fleet.

CHAP. XLVI.

THE EARL OF ARUNDEL AND HIS FLEET ARE DRIVEN BY STORMS TO LA PALICE, NEAR LA ROCHELLE.

—THE LORD LEWIS DE SANCERRE, HAVING HAD INFORMATION OF THIS, CHACES THEM AT SEA, BUT IN VAIN.—THE DUKE OF LANCASTER MARRIES HIS DAUGHTER TO THE HEIR OF CASTILLE.

BFFORE the king of France went to Gueldres, and during the time he was there, the english fleet under the command of the earl of Arundel kept hovering along his coasts, just as the wind drove them, in search of adventures. You must know, that generally from the first of October to All-saints day the weather is stormy; but this year it was unusually so, which shattered the english fleet, and there was no seaman on board, however bold he might be, but was frightened at its violence, which forced the ships to run to any port lest worse might befal them.

The earl of Arundel, with twenty-seven other vessels, made for the harbour of la Palice, two leagues distant from la Rochelle, where he anchored: indeed, he was forced so to do, for the wind was contrary and he could not leave it. When news was brought of this to la Rochelle, the Vol. IX.

townsmen were much alarmed, thinking the English intended attacking the place: they closed their gates, and remained guarding them for a day and half. Intelligence came from la Palice, that the force of the English amounted to no more than twenty-two vessels, driven thither by stress of weather, and desirous only of putting to sea again; that, however, the earl of Arundel, sir Henry Beaumont, sir William Elmham, and upwards of thirty english knights were there. The Rochellers, on this, consulted how to act; and, having well considered the matter, they said they should not do their duty if they did not march to skirmish with the enemy.

At this period, the lord Lewis de Sancerre, marshal of France, was arrayed and marshalled before the castle of Bouteville, with a large body of the chivalry of Poitou, Saintonge and other parts, and had there inclosed William de Sainte Foix, a Gascon; for all men at arms had not accompanied the king of France, and the lord de Sancerre was lieutenant of the country, from Montpellier to la Rochelle, during the absence of the lord de Coucy with the army in Germany. The Rochellers determined to fend information of the arrival of the English to the lord de Sancerre, who on hearing it was much rejoiced. He ordered the townsmen to arm fix or eight galleys, and to embark on board, for he was on his march to combat the English.— This they did; and fir Lewis broke up his siege and marched away, thinking it would be more to his honour and profit to engage the earl of Arundel and the english knights lying at anchor, than to continue the siege, for he could again return to this at his pleasure.

He came to la Rochelle, followed by a large body of knights and fquires. I know not by what means, but the earl of Arundel had information at la Palice, that the marshal of France with a powerful company of knights and squires was marching to attack him. The news was not very agreeable to him; but fortunately the weather had become calm, and he instantly gave orders to weigh anchor and put to sea. This was speedily effected: had they waited longer they would have been furtounded within the haven, and every one of his vessels must necessarily have been taken, for not one could have escaped.

The galleys from la Rochelle, fully armed with cannons and other artillery, appeared in fight, steering for la Palice, as the English were under fail. They chaced them two leagues, faluting them with their cannon, but dared not follow them further, for fear of the dangers of the sea. They therefore returned to la Rochelle; but the marshal of France was much angered against them, for having been so tardy to inform him of the arrival of the enemy.

The earl of Arundel failed for the mouth of the Garonne, to repair to Bordeaux; and the fiege of Bouteville was put an end to, for William de Sainte Foix, during the time the marshal had gone, as he thought, to fight the English, had provided his castle with all things necessary for a long defence.

X 2 We

We will now return to the duke of Lancaster, and speak of his negotiations with the king of Castille and duke of Berry respecting the marriage of his daughter. The king of Castille was desirous of having her for his son, as the means of peace with England. The duke of Berry wished her for himself, being very impatient to marry her.

The duke of Lancaster was wife and prudent: he faw that the most advantageous alliance for himfelf and for his country was Castille, in preference to the duke of Berry; for by it he should recover the inheritance of Castille for his daughter, in times to come. If he gave her to the duke of Berry, and he should die before her, she would be poor in comparison with other ladies; for the duke had children by his first marriage, who would be entitled to all his landed property. The duchess of Lancafter was likewife more inclined to the connection with Castille, so that when sir Helion de Lignac had left the duke, on his return to the duke of Berry in Germany, the commissioners from the king of Castille came forward, and pushed the matter fo warmly, that the marriage was agreed and fworn to, between the lady Catherine and the fon of the king of Castille. Proper contracts were drawn up and fealed, with covenants to prevent any danger of breaking off the match; and the duchess confented, when the whole should be concluded, to conduct her daughter into Castille.

CHAP. XLVII.

THE KING OF FRANCE, WHILE ON THE FRONTIERS OF JULIERS, HAS PART OF HIS CAMP SURPRISED, AND SEVERAL PRISONERS MADE, BY SOME GERMAN PILLAGERS.—THE KING, BEING TWENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE, TAKES ON HIMSELF THE GOVERNMENT OF HIS KINGDOM.—HE SENDS TO THE KING OF CASTILLE, ON HEARING OF THE MARRIAGE OF HIS SON WITH THE DAUGHTER OF THE DUKE OF LANCASTER, TO REMONSTRATE WITH HIM NOT TO ENTER INTO ANY TREATIES THAT MAY BE PRESUDDICIAL TO HIM OR TO HIS KINGDOM.

THE king of France was still on the borders of Juliers, (for you have heard on what grounds peace had been made between him and the dukes of Juliers and Gueldres) though on his march with the army back to France, when one clear moonlight night, as they were encamped on the confines of Germany, fome german robbers, who would never accept of any terms of peace, made, about midnight, an attack on the French. These men were under the lord de Blanquenemen and fir Peter de Croncbech, and came well mounted, to observe where they could make the feverest attack on the camp. They passed the quarters of the viscount de Meaux, but found him and his men on their guard; and, having gone backward and forward without faying faying a word, they returned, to give an account to their leaders, at their ambufcade, of what they had feen.

Shortly after, a large body of these Germans made an irruption on the french camp, overthrowing I know not how many, and making sourteen men at arms prisoners. The lord de la Vieville and the lord de Montkarel were among the number, in consequence of great neglect in not having placed sufficient guards. When it was known, on the morrow, that these two lords were made prisoners, the army were much vexed at it, and ever afterward were more attentive to their guards.

When the king left Juliers, none of the garrifons remained behind: fir William de la Trimouille and fir Gervais de Merande joined him, and the Brabanters retired to their own homes.

While on the march, and immediately on the king's return to France, it was determined, by great deliberation of the council, that the king, who had, fince the death of his father, been under the management of his uncles, should now take on himself the government of the kingdom, which his uncles must resign into his hands, as they had enough to do elsewhere, and the king had now entered his twenty-first year. When this was made public, it gave universal satisfaction.

I believe the king, with his uncles and brother, kept the feast of All-saints at Rheims; and that there they first heard of peace being made between the king of Castille and duke of Lancaster, and of the marriage of the lady Catherine with the infant.

The king of France laughed and joked much with his uncle, the duke of Berry, faying,—'Fair uncle, you have failed in your intended marriage, for another has feized the lady you meant for your bride. What do you fay to this? How does your courage stand?' The duke good-humouredly replied,—'My lord, if I have been disappointed in this, I will address myself elsewhere.'

Those present began to murmur about this marriage, and to fay, it had not been concluded without fome treaties of alliance having been formed which might be very prejudicial hereafter to France; for,' added some who seemed to be fully aware of the confequences, 's should England, Castille and Portugal unite, and make war upon us, they would be enabled to do us very ferious mischief by fea and land. It will be right for the king of France to fend fome difcreet perfon to prevent this wicked king, who has thus connected himself with a dead man, (for the duke of Lancaster has neither money nor men) from entering into any treaties without the confent of the council of France; otherwise to fay, the king would reduce him to the state of the lowest variet with the same ease with which he had raifed him to his present state; for at this moment he has no ally strong enough to sup-A war with Castille would now come port him. very opportunely; and, after dethroning this wicked king, the fon of a baftard, the king might beflow the crown on his brother, the duke of Touraine, who is not over rich: he would govern it wifely, and defend it valiantly. How could this king king of Castille think of entering into any treaty whatever with the duke of Lancaster unknown to our king, who has so generously affisted him in his distress; and, had it not been for the blood of France, he must have lost his realm. He bargains well, and has now done so; but let it be as we say, and he will be deserted and disgraced; and, in God's name, let such an envey be sem whither as will be attended to, and make him seel how very ill he has behaved.'

These murmurings increased so much that the king, his uncles and council deliberated whom they should fend to remonstrate with the king of Castille, that he enter not, at his peril, into treaties with the duke of Lancaster and the English any way detrimental to the crown of France. If he had done fo, or intended it, he was to be told, that the power of France would debafe him as much, if not more than it had exalted him, and that the king and his country would not attend to any other thing before they had completed his destruction. It was long debated who would be the properest person to send thither; for it was agreed it should be some one of courage and well spoken, as it would be fruitless fending simple persons on fuch a meffage. Three were named; the lord de Coucy, fir John de Vienne admiral of France, and fir Guy de la Trimouille, and either of these three would be fully qualified to go to Castille. Having confidered all things, they chofe fir John de Vienne; and it was told him, on the part of the king and his council,— Admiral, make your preparations for a journey to Castille: you will have no other than credential letters, for it is enough that you are master of the subject on which you are fent. Tell the king of Castille to read or have read to him all the treaties of alliances, and promises of friendship, which have been formed and sworn to between the two crowns; and remember well all the answers you may receive from him or his ministers on this subject, that we may regulate our conduct accordingly.' All this, the admiral said, he would studiously attend to.

The admiral was not long in making preparations for his journey, and, having taken leave of the king and his uncles, left Paris, taking the road towards Burgundy; for he was defirous of vifiting the pope and his brother at Avignon, which he did.

We will now for a while leave him, and fay fomething of Geoffry Tête-noir and the fiege of Ventadour, in which he was inclosed; but we must first speak of the duke of Berry, whose impatience to marry again was shewn within the year, when he took to himself a wife, of whom I shall speak, and say who she was, and where he was married,

CHAP. XLVIII.

THE DUKE OF BERRY, BEING DISAPPOINTED IN HI3 MARRIAGE WITH THE DAUGHTER OF THE DUKE OF LANCASTER, SENDS TO THE COUNT DE FOIN TO DEMAND THE DAUGHTER OF THE COUNT DE BOULOGNE, WHOM HE HAD IN WARDSHIP.

THE duke of Berry, having been disappointed in marrying the daughter of the duke of Lancaster, was told that the count de Boulogne had a beautiful daughter called Jane, by the lady Eleanor de Comminges; that she was not with her father nor mother, but in the country of Béarn with his good friend and coufin the count de Foix; that she had been educated by the count, in his castle of Orthès, for the space of nine years, and he had the wardship of all her property; and that the father and mother had not any way interfered fince she had been under the care of the count, nor had the young lady cost them any thing; that she had been often demanded in marriage, but the count de Foix had turned a deaf ear, faying, she was yet too young, and in particular by fir Bernard, brother to the count d'Armagnac, who had repeatedly prefied the matter, promifing, on the accomplishment of this marriage, to put an end to his war on Béarn

Bearn and his claims on that country. Notwithflanding these fair promises, the count would not listen to him, but said that his cousin was too young.

He gave, however, other reasons to his confidential friends, and said to fir Espaign du Lyon,—
'These Armagnacs must think me a great fool, when they ask me to consent to my destruction. If I give them my cousin, I shall add to their strength, and weaken myself. They already withhold from her by force her inheritance, in right of her mother, of Comminges; for the count de Boulogne is as nobody to oppose them.'

When the count d'Armagnac and his brother, fir Bernard, found they could not fucceed, they spoke to the duke of Berry, during the life of their aunt, his first duchess, that it would be a good match for his son, John of Berry.

The duke, in consequence, had sent properlyqualified persons to the count de Foix in Béarn, to entreat that all former animosities might be forgiven and forgotten, and that he would consent to the marriage of his cousin and ward with his son John; for that the count de Boulogne, her father, was very well satisfied that it should take place.

The count entertained the envoys handfomely, but excused himself for not complying with their demand, as the lady was too young; and because he had most solemnly promised and sworn to the countess her mother, when she delivered her into his hands, that he would never betroth her to any person whatever without her knowledge. He would would therefore keep his oath, and no one ought to attempt to make him break it. These were the excuses the count made; for he knew well that his cousin, the counters of Comminges, who resided with her brother, the count d'Urguel in Arragon, would never consent to her daughter's marriage with any one connected with the Armagnacs.

The ambaliadors from the duke of Berry returned, therefore, unfuccefsfully; and in their abfence the count de Foix faid, (as I learnt from fir Espaign du Lyon)-- The duke of Berry and his advifers must think me very weak and ignorant, when they propose that I should reinforce my ene-John of Berry is cousin to my adversaries, the Armagnacs: this match I will never confent to, and had much rather marry her in England; and I have already had propofals from Henry of Lancaster, son to the duke of Lancaster. were not afraid of too much angering the king of France, no one else should have my cousin. At this moment I know not how to act; but I will marry her to my own fatisfaction, to prevent any of the Armagnacs having her against my will; for, as the whole depends on my determination, I have no occasion to be melancholy, or to be very anxious on this fubject.'

When the duke of Berry knew for certain that the duke of Lancaster intended marrying his daughter with the infant of Castille, and that there were no hopes of breaking it off, he was so pensive and melancholy for five or fix days, that those of his nearest relations inquired the cause of it. Having opened epened his mind to them, and complained of his disappointment, his council replied,—'Sir, if you have failed with the lady Catherine of Lancaster, you may be more successful in another quarter, with the daughter of a great lord, and who, in due time, will be a considerable heiress, though at this moment she is a little too young for your time of life; and I know not if the count de Foix will not on this account resule his consent.' 'Is she the daughter of the count de Boulogne?' asked the duke. 'Yes, my lord.' In God's name,' replied the duke, 'Iet us make the trial.'

It was not long after this before he wrote to the count de Foix to fignify to him, in the most friendly manner, that he would fend him four knights of high quality, such as the count de Sancerre, the lord de la Riviere, fir Guy de la Trimouille and the viscount d'Assy, to treat with him for his ward, the daughter of the count de Boulogne, in marriage; and these lords were of such importance, as to justify him in putting implicit faith in them; but he begged of him to send him a speedy answer to his letter, that these knights might not undertake a commission that would be unsuccessful.

The count de Foix received handsomely the messengers who brought this letter, and wrote back by them to the duke of Berry, that he was very happy in the proposals he had made, and was ready to receive the four knights either in Foix or in Béarn; but that the consent of the count and countess de Boulogne must first be had.

The duke of Berry was well pleafed on receiving fuch an answer, and negotiated with one and another, during the winter, that his marriage might take place in the course of the summer. The business, notwithstanding, was not so soon accomplished; for the duke of Berry knew well that the count de Foix was not a person to act hastily, and that there would be many questions and replies before the matter could be expected to be brought to a conclusion. He therefore prudently carried on the treaty, by sending special messengers to pope Clement, who was nearly related to the young lady.

The pope was rejoiced at hearing his cousin would be so highly connected as with the duke of Berry, uncle to the king of France; and he wrote, in consequence, to the count de Foix, to notify to him in an honourable manner, that he would not on any account this proposal should be rejected, for their families would be made by it.

The count de Foix received letters from all quarters; for he could, on fuch occasions, well dissemble his real sentiments, and yet retain the affections of all, the pope as well as the duke of Berry; but there were none so wise among them, that knew what were the count's real thoughts.

We will now leave this matter, and return to the fiege of Ventadour.

CHAP. XLIX.

GEOFFRY TETE-NOIR IS WOUNDED IN THE HEAD, AT A SKIRMISH, AND COMMITS EXCESSES WHICH CAUSE HIS DEATH.—HE MAKES A WILL, AND SUBSTITUTES TWO GOVERNORS OF VENTADOUE IN HIS ROOM.

YOU have before heard how fir William de Lignac and fir John Bonne-lance, with many knights and squires from Auvergne and Limousin, had befieged the castle of Ventadour, and Geoffry Tête-noir within it. It was fo strong, that it could not be taken by ftorm; and he had lain in fuch stores of all things, as to secure a sufficiency for feven or eight years, without any thing new being added. The befiegers, who had furrounded it with blockhouses, came at times to skirmish at the barriers; and it happened that, at one of these, Geoffry Tête-noir advanced fo far that he was struck on the head by a bolt from a crofs-bow, which passed through the helmet and cap underneath, and wounded him so feverely as to occasion him to be carried to his bed. His companions were much vexed at this, and, during the time he was in this state, all skirmishing ceased.

Had he taken proper care of himself, he would have soon been cured of this wound; but he indulged dulged himself in many excesses, particularly in fornication, for which he paid dearly enough by his death. He was warned of the consequences of this conduct, and told that he was in so dangerous a condition, (the wound having become an imposshume) that it was necessary he should settle his affairs. He did, and made his will in the way I shall relate.

He ordered the principal persons of his garrison, and those who had been the most used to arms, into his presence; and when they were come, he said to them, fitting up in his bed, - ' My fair firs, and companions in arms, I know I am in great danger of death: we have been a long time together, and I have been a loyal captain to you all, to the utmost of my power; I should wish, therefore, to fee, before I quit this world, my fuccessor appointed, who would gallantly behave himfelf towards you and defend this caftle, which I shall leave plentifully stocked with all necessary things, such as wines, provision and artillery. I therefore beg you will tell me if you have taken any steps, or have thought of electing any one able to govern and lead you as men at arms ought to be governed and led, for fuch has been my manner of carrying on the war; and in truth I cared not against whom. I did indeed make it under shadow of the king of England's name, in preference to any other; but I have always looked for gain and conquest whereever they may be had; and fuch should ever be the conduct of adventurous companions, who are for deeds of arms and to advance themselves.

5 This country is very fertile: many good compositions have been made with it, though the French now check them by their war; but this cannot always last, for their blockhouses and siege must have an end. Now, tell me truly, have any of you thought of the person who is to succeed me?

The companions remaining filent, he again addressed them with the utmost good humour, saying,—'I can easily believe you have had some conversations together on what I have mentioned; and I also, during the time I have been forced to keep my bed, have thought on this matter for you.' Sir,' replied they, 'we refer the matter to you; and it will be more agreeable if it came from you than from us: you will therefore be pleased to inform us of your will.'

'Yes,' faid Geoffry, 'I will tell you, and name those I wish to succeed me. Here is Alleyn Roux and his brother Peter, my cousins, who are good men at arms and of my blood: I entreat you, therefore, to accept of Alleyn as your governor, and that you will swear to him, in my presence, loyalty and obedience, as well as to his brother; but I mean that Alleyn should have the sovereign command.' 'Sir,' answered they, 'we will cheerfully do so, for you have well chosen.'

All the companions then took oaths of obedience to Alleyn Roux, and to his brother Peter. When this was done, Geoffry Tête-noir again addressed them: 'Well, my friends, you have complied with my request, and I thank you for it. Because Vol. IX.

I wish you should partake of what you have helped me to conquer, I must inform you, that in that cheft which you fee yonder (pointing to it with his finger), there is a fum of thirty thousand francs. I would acquit my conscience and myself towards those who have faithfully ferved me: fay, therefore, if you will truly fulfil the articles of my will." Having faid they would, he continued: 'In the first place, I leave to the chapel of St. George, within our walls, the fum of fifteen hundred francs for repairs and additional buildings. I give to my mistress, who has been faithfully attached to me, two thousand five hundred francs-To Alleyn Roux, your governor, two thousand francs-To my valets de chambre, five hundred francs-To my officers, fifteen hundred francs. The furplus I thus dispose of: you are about thirty companions, all engaged in the same enterprise, and you should behave like brothers to each other, without envy, riot or strife. The sum I have mentioned you will find in the chest: divide it, therefore, among you fairly and honourably; but should the devil get among you, and you cannot agree, here is a well tempered sharp axe, cut open the chest, and let those who can, feize the contents.'

To this fpeech, they unanimously replied,— Lord and master, we will not disagree. We have so much loved and feared you, we will never break the chest, nor disobey any of the orders you have given us.'

Such as I have related was the last will of Geoffry Tête-noir, who only lived two days more, and was buried in the chapel of Saint George in Ventadour. All his legacies were paid, and the overplus divided among them according to his orders, and Alleyn Roux with his brother Peter were obeyed as governors of the castle.

The blockade, however, was not for this raised, nor were the skirmishes less frequent. The french knights and squires of Auvergne and Limousin were rejoiced at the death of Geosffry Tête-noir, and were not so much afraid of those he had lest behind, for he had been a most active and successful captain in war and in forming garrisons.

We will now return to the duke of Gueldres for a short time, and say what befel him at this seaseafon; having already mentioned the trouble he had given to the king of France and his uncles, by forcing them to march to the borders of his country, and then to return without doing him any considerable damage.

CHAP. L.

THE DUKE OF GUELDRES IS MADE PRISONER IN PRUSSIA; AND, THOUGH DELIVERED BY THE KNIGHTS OF THE TEUTONIC ORDER, HE RETURNS TO KEEP HIS FAITH TO THE PERSON WHO HAD TAKEN HIM.

WHEN the duke of Gueldres perceived that the whole army of France had retreated, and that peace was established with the duches of Brabant and his other enemies by means of the treaties, the particulars of which you have heard related: one of the articles being understood to have been the surrender of the town of Grave within the year, on such conditions as had been agreed on between him, the duke of Burgundy and duches of Brabant, and when he found he had now nothing to do at home, under these circumstances, I say, he resolved to make an excursion into Prussia.

He made preparations accordingly, and, accompanied by many knights and squires of his own and other countries, began his journey thither about the octave of Saint Martin, taking his road through Germany. Wherever he passed, he was hand-somely received, and arrived on the territory of Prussia. I know not how it happened, but he and his company were waylaid in the plains, and attacked by a body of men at arms, of whom he had not the least suspicion, and for that reason they were overpowered. They lost their arms, horses, gold and silver plate, and were carried prisoners to a town hard by, where all who could ransom themselves did so: particularly the duke of Gueldres pledged himself to a squire called Arurant; his sirname I am ignorant of; and then the duke of Gueldres and his company were led to a strong town of the duke de Stulpe*, not that the duke was there in person.

When the grand master and knights of the teutonic order heard that the duke of Gueldres had been attacked and made prisoner on his road to Prussia, they were exceedingly enraged, and said it should not remain unpunished, otherwise they would be greatly blamed. They instantly issued their summons for the attendance of their vassals, and marched with a large force of men at arms from Commisberg† to the town wherein the duke of Gueldres was detained prisoner.

The fquire who had made the duke prisoner,

Conrad Zœlner de Rodenstein, - - - 1390
Conrad de Wallenrod, - - - - - 1394
Conrad de Jungingen, - - - - - 1407
Ulrick, killed in battle, - - - - 1410

* Duke of Stulpe. Q. if not Ulrick, grand master of the teutonic order; but, on looking into the list of grand masters, I find that Weinrich de Knippenrode, G. M. died - 1382

† Commisberg, Q. Koningsberg.

having heard of this expedition, was alarmed for the confequences, and determined to leave the castle, as ill might befal him should he be taken; but before he departed he waited on the duke of Gueldres, and thus spoke: 'Duke of Gueldres, you are my prisoner, and I am your master. You, as a gentleman, have pledged your faith and oath, that wherever I should please to go, thither you would follow me I know not if you have fent for the grand master of the teutonic order, but he is marching hither in fuch force that I do not think it prudent to wait for him. Do you remain, if you pleafe, but I shall carry away your faith with me.' To this the duke of Gueldres making no reply, the fquire departed, and, having mounted his horse, rode off to a castle of greater strength; but, on his going away, he added, 'You will find me at fuch a place,' and named to him the castle, which was very strong, and far from all roads.

He was no fooner gone than the grand master arrived with a confiderable force: no one issued forth to oppose him: and, had he found the squire within, he would infallibly have put him to death. He therefore returned to Koningsberg, carrying the duke of Gueldres with him.

I will relate what was the end of this event; for in whatever country it was told, and especially in Germany, it was variously spoken of, to the great astonishment of all lords who heard it. When the duke of Gueldres arrived at Koningsberg, having obtained his liberty in the manner I have said, he considered that he had pledged his saith to return to the squire who had made him prisoner: likewise remembering what the squire had said on his departure, he was much cast down, and thought himself bounden in honour to acquit himself loyally towards him. He therefore told the grand master he could not longer remain with him, nor for any dispensation or absolution would give up his intention of surrendering himself to his master in the castle where he had been appointed to do so; which every one considered as an act of great honour.

When this came to the ears of his relations and fubjects in Gueldres, they treated for his liberty, which they obtained through the means of the duke of Stulpe, who took much pains in the business; but, before the duke would consent to his enlargement, he made the duke of Gueldres swear, that neither himself, his heirs, nor any person attached to him, would ever seek open or private revenge for the insult he had received. Thus was the duke of Gueldres set at liberty; but in the year 1388 did this missortune befal him. Let us return to fir John de Vienne, admiral of France, and relate what he said from the king of France to the king of Castille.

CHAP. LI.

SIR JOHN DE VIENNE, HAVING RECEIVED HIS ANSWER FROM THE KING OF CASTILLE, RETURNS TO FRANCE.—THE DUKE OF LANCASTER PROCEEDS IN THE MARRIAGE OF HIS DAUGHTER TO THE INFAN'T OF CASTILLE.—THE EARL OF ARUNDEL, HAVING MADE SOME CRUISES ON THE COASTS OF NORMANDY, RETURNS WITH HIS FLEET TO ENGLAND.

THE admiral of France continued his journey until he arrived in Castille, when he inquired where the king refided. He was answered, ' Most commonly at Burgos,' whither he then rode. Having dismounted at his inn, he made himself ready to go to the palace; but as foon as the king's household heard of his arrival, he was visited by them, most honourably, according to the custom of the country, from their attachment to the king of France, to whom they held themselves much indebted, and he was conducted to the king's apartment. Sir John was kindly greeted by the king, to whom he gave his letters. The king took them, and called his council aside, when, having read and confidered them, they found he had full powers given him, and fir John was called and bade to explain plain the cause of his coming. He, who was ready prepared, thus spoke, in handsome language:

' Sir king, and you gentlemen of his council, the king of France fends me hither, on account of the marriage which he has heard is about to take place between your fon and the caughter of the duke of Lancaster, who is, as you know, his enemy. The king of France and his ministers are greatly at a lofs to conceive how you could think of entering into any treaty of marriage, or other engagement, without their being nade acquainted with it; for they fay truly, that no union can be formed between children without great intimacy and affection of the parents being the confequences. They therefore tell you, by my mouth, to be careful not to enter into any treaties tha may be prejudicial to the king of France; and that those, so folemnly fworn to be observed by the late king Henry, your father, the prelates, robles and cities of the realm, be no way infringed, otherwife you will incur the pain of excommunication from the pope, and the indignation of the king and barons of France, whom you will find, to your difgrace, your most bitter enemies. This i what I am ordered to fay to you from the king of France and his council.'

When the king of Castille and hose present heard such a reproachful message from ne king of France, they were so much astonished, that they looked at each other, but not one attempted to make any reply. A bishop, however, who happened to be there, made the following answer:

Sir John, you are newly arrived in this country, and the king and ourselves are glad to see you, and bid you welcome. Fair fir, the king has perfectly heard and understood your message, and you shall shortly, within a day or two, have such an anfwer as will give you fatisfaction.' 'It is enough,' replied fir John de Vienne, who then took leave of the king and council and returned to his lodgings. It was reported to me that he remained feven days without laving any answer; that there was very great diffenbling on this occasion, and he became quite meancholy, for he never faw the king. but remained in his apartment, fcarcely visited by any one. Sir ohn de Vienne, noticing this delay, fpoke of it to bme of the council, whom he fometimes faw, decaring he would return without the answer. The suspected he would keep his word and do as he fiid, for in truth fuch was his inten-He was therefore invited to the palace, and fuch answers nade him, that, on his return, he told the king of France, and those who had fent him, not to beunder any uneafiness respecting the king of Castill or his council, for they would never enter into any treaties with England that should, in the smallest degree, be detrimental to those which had been formel between France and Castille.

If the king of Castille married his son to the daughter of the dike of Lancaster, according to the unanimous win of his country, as the means of obtaining peace and extinguishing all claims on his crown, it ount not to have given umbrage to the king of Frace nor to that nation; for the king of Castille and his subjects were firmly resolved to adhere to every point of the treaties existing between them and France.

Such was the purport of the answer fir John de Vienne had brought from Castille. The king of Castille and the duke of Lancaster proceeded in the marriage, and a treaty of peace was amicably agreed on between them, by the before-mentioned commissioners, for the duke still resided in the Bordelois. He had come with his duchess and daughter from Bayonne to Bordeaux, where he was joyfully received, as they were desirous of his living among them, and thence had gone to Libourne*.

When it was known for certain, in the castle of the count de Foix, that the king of Castille had made peace with the duke of Lancaster, and had put an end to all his claims, by the marriage of his fon with the lady Catherine of Lancaster, to whom he had given extensive territories in Castille, besides a large sum to the duke, amounting to two hundred thousand nobles, the count was greatly astonished, (for I was then present) and said; This king of Castille is a poor creature to make peace with a dead man; for I am sure the duke of Lancaster was in so bad a way he knew not where to turn himself. On my faith, continued the count, the duke is a man of ability, and has prudently managed this matter.

* Libourne, a town on the confluence of the Dordogne and Garonne, five leagues north-east from Bordeaux.

It was about Christmas that the sleet of the earl of Arundel, which had been hovering the whole year along the coasts of Brittany, la Rochelle, Saintonge and the Bordelois, came to the shores of Normandy, and sailed by Carentan. It had indeed before landed at Cherbourg, and the earl seemed inclined to make war on that part of the country. The town of Carentan and its dependencies were under the command of the lord de Hambre and the lord de Torci, who had with them a considerable number of knights and squires of Normandy.

The earl of Arundel, learning how strongly it was garrisoned, passed by, thinking he might lose more than he could gain were he to attack it, and sell on another town, called Torigny*, which he took by storm, and gained great wealth by plundering it. They carried away many prisoners, and marched to the barriers of Bayeux, but only made a slight skirmish. The English passed the fords of St. Clement and did great damage to those parts; for they staid there for sisteen days without any one coming to oppose them.

The marshal de Blainville was indeed in Normandy; but he had no information of what was passing, or he would have provided a remedy. The English having finished their expedition, and done one hundred thousand francs of mischief to Normandy, made a prudent retreat, and, re-crossing the fords, returned to Cherbourg, where they embarked their pillage fafely on board the fleet: having weighed anchor, they took to the deep, and landed at Southampton. Such were the deeds done by this fleet, under the command of the earl of Arundel.

* Torigny, a town in Normandy, three leagues from St. Lo, eight from Coutances.

CHAP. LII.

THE LORD LEWIS DE SANCERRE VISITS THE COUNT DE FOIX AT ORTHES.—A DEED OF ARMS IS PERFORMED, BEFORE THE DUKE OF LANCASTER AT BORDEAUX, BETWEEN FIVE FRENCH AND FIVE ENGLISH MEN.

THE lord Lewis de Sancerre, marshal of France, at this time resided at Toulouse or Carcassone in Languedoc, and was well informed of the treaties that were in agitation between the duke of Berry and the count de Foix, for the marriage of the daughter of the count de Boulogne, whom the duke wished to have, although the lady was very young. The marshal had a desire to visit the count de Foix at Orthès, and I believe (from the information I had from his people, who found me there at Christmas) the king of France had ordered him thither, and I will relate on what errand.

The king of France was at this period very young, though anxious to manage his government well.

well. He had never vifited Languedoc, which is an extensive province filled with towns and castles, that had been almost ruined by the oppressions of the duke of Berry. Heavy complaints of this had been made to the king when he took the government into his own hands; and he said he would travel into Languedoc, and visit the pope, whom he had never yet seen, and he was likewise desirous of seeing the count de Foix, of whose largesses and valour he had heard so much.

The marshal de Sancerre left Toulouse with full five hundred horse, rode to Tarbes in Bigorre, and thence to Orthès in Béarn. The count de Foix, having had intimation of his coming, ordered the flewards of his household to have the town of Orthès properly prepared for his reception, as his visit gave him great pleafure. These orders were punctually obeyed, and lodgings were marked out in the town for the marshal's attendants, but he himfelf difmounted at the castle. The count de Foix went out of the town to meet him, attended by more than three hundred horse, and received him most kindly. The lord Lewis de Sancerre remained at Orthès about fix days; and he then acquainted the count of the king's intended journey into Lunguedoc, and his defire to fee him.

'In good faith,' replied the count de Foix, 'he will be welcome there, and I will with pleafure wait on him.' 'Indeed, my lord,' answered the marsshal, 'but it is the king's wish to know on his arrival in Languedoc, plainly and openly, whether you mean to attach yourself to the French or to the English;

English; for in these wars you have dissembled your real sentiments, and have never borne arms either from summons or entreaties.'

'Ah, lord Lewis,' faid the count de Foix, 'I give you many thanks for having spoken to me on this subject. If I have excused myself from bearing arms for either fide, I have, as I think, good reasons for it: the wars between England and France no way concern me, for I hold my country of Béarn from God, my fword, and by inheritance. I have not, therefore, any cause to enter into the fervice, or incur the hatred of either of these kings. I know well, that my enemics, the Armagnacs, have done all in their power to put me in the ill graces of both monarchs; for before the prince of Wales marched into Spain, at the infligation of the count d'Armagnac, he would have made war on me, having a strong inclination for it, if fir John Chandos had not prevented him. Thanks, however, to God, I have always kept myself on my guard in as courteous a manner as poslible, and fhall continue to do fo as long as I live: after my death, matters must take the turn that is natural for them.

Thus did the count de Foix and the marshal de Sancerre converse as long as he staid. On his departure, the count presented him with a handsome courser, a fine mule and good hackney, all of them richly caparisoned. He gave also to fir Robert Challies, to fir Richard Dauphin, and to the knights of the marshal, two hundred francs each, and to five of his squires sifty francs.

When the marshal took his leave, to return to Toulouse, I wanted to accompany him; but the count de Foix would not allow me, and bade me stay longer with him. This I was forced to comply with, and wait his will. The lord Lewis, on leaving Orthès, took the road to Tarbes, whither he was escorted by the lord dauphin of Bigorre, and fir Peter Cabestan, one of the count de Foix's household.

About this time, of the year 1389, there was a deed of arms performed at Bordeaux, before the duke of Lancaster, between five Englishmen and the fame number of French, of whom some were of the household of the marshal of France. The combatants were fir Pecton d'Allagine, a gafcon Englishman, against sir Morice Manniguet, a Frenchman; fir Arragon Raymond, english, against the bastard de Chauvigny, french; sir Lewis Malapers, governor of Aigues-Mortes, english, against Jacquemin Corne de Cerf, french; Archibald de Villiers, french, against the fon of the lord de Chaumont, gascon-english. Many knights and squires from Béarn, and of the household of the count de Foix, being desirous of seeing these combats, went thither: I accompanied them; for it is but twenty-four leagues from Orthès to Bordeaux, and we were spectators of these duels, which were fought in the square before St. Andrews, in the presence of the duke and duchess of Lancaster, their daughter, and the ladies and damfels of the country. They did not combat altogether, but each party feparately; and were to perform perform three courses with spears, three with swords, the same number with battle-axes, and three with daggers, all on horseback. The tiltings occupied three days, and were gallantly performed without any of the ten being wounded. Sir Raymond killed the horse of the bastard de Chauvigny, which greatly angered the duke of Lancaster: he blamed the knight much for having pointed his spear too low, and presented the bastard with one of his own horses.

Such was the end of this deed of arms, which being finished, every one returned to his own home:

CHAP. LIII.

THE DUCHESS OF LANCASTER CARRIES HER DAUGH-TER TO CASTILLE, TO MARRY HER TO THE IN-FANT.—HAVING FOUND THE BONES OF HER FA-THER, SHE HAS THEM CONVEYED TO SEVILLE, AND BURIED WITH REGAL OBSEQUIES.

SHORTLY after these deeds of arms, the duchess of Lancaster made preparations for her journey into Castille, whither she was to carry her daughter, to solemnize her marriage with the son of the king of Castille. It was her intention, when in Castille, to visit the field of battle of Monteil, where Vol. IX.

ber father, don Pedro, had lost his life, and make strict inquiries where his body had at that time been buried, which, when found, was to be taken up, and conveyed to the city of Seville, and magnificently interred there, in a manner becoming a king.

When in the month of March (1389) the fun began to have fome force, and the days to lengthen, the duchefs, having her array ready, fet out from Bordeaux, and went to Bayonne, where she parted from the duke, who returned to Bordeaux. She and her ladies continued their journey to the city of Dax, where they were joyfully received, as that town belonged to England. They there reposed themselves for two days, and then pursued their road through the country of the Basques, the pass of Roncesvalles, and entered Navarre. At Pampeluna, they found the king and queen of Navarre, who received them kindly: for the queen was sister to the king of Castille.

The duchefs of Lancaster and her daughter were upwards of a month traversing Navarre, for they resided at different parts with the king and queen; and wherever they went all their expenses were defrayed.

On their entrance into Castille, they were most respectfully treated by those of the king's household who had been sent to meet them: there were also deputies from different parts of the realm; and the young prince was to have the title of prince of Galicia.

The marriage having been folemnifed, and all contracts figned, the duchefs left her daughter with the king and her young husband, who was then but eight years old. She took leave of the king to go to Monteil, as she had proposed, who had her attended by the greatest personages of his court. On her arrival at Monteil, such researches were made, that she discovered where her father had been buried, and had his bones taken up, washed and embalined, and carried in a cossin to Seville, where the cavalcade was met by large processions from that town.

The bones were conveyed to the cathedral, and there most reverently buried, with very sclemm obsequies, which were attended by king John of Casatille, his son, the young prince of Galicia, and the greater part of the prelates and barons of the realm.

After the obsequies, each person returned home; the king of Castille, accompanied by his son and daughter-in-law, went to Val di Soria; but the duchess of Lancaster went to Medina del Campo, a handsome and large town, which now belonged to her by the late treaties of peace, and remained there some time.

We will leave speaking of her and of Castille, and relate the marriage of the duke of Berry, and other events which ensued.

CHAP. LIV.

THE DUKE OF BERRY NEGOTIATES SO SUCCESSFULLY WITH THE COUNT DE FOIX, THAT HE SENDS TO HIM HIS COUSIN OF BOULOGNE, WHOM HE INSTANTLY MARRIES.

THE duke of Berry, whose first duchess, the lady Joan of Armagnac, had departed this life, was very impatient to marry again; for no fooner was he affured of having failed in his propofals to the duke of Lancaster than he set clerks to work, and, with proper messengers, fent to negotiate with the count de Foix for the daughter of the count de Boulogne, whom he had had in wardship for nine years. Because the duke of Berry had no prospect of success but through the count de Foix, (who was of fuch a character that he would do nothing that was difagreeable to himfelf for either father, mother, pope, or any friend the young lady had,) he opened himfelf to his nephew the king of France and to his brother of Burgundy, entreating them earnestly to interfere in the bufinefs.

The king laughed most heartily at his uncle of Berry, who was now of a certain age, and said,— girl of only twelve years old, and you are fixty? On my faith, it is great folly in you to think of fuch things. Propose my fair cousin John, your son, to her, who is of a proper age, and a more suitable match.'

My good uncle, what will you do with a young girl

- 'My lord,' replied the duke, 'this has been proposed, but the count de Foix would not listen to it, because my son descends by the mother from the Armagnacs, and they are now and have been some time at war. If the girl is too young, I will spare her a while, until she be a perfect woman.'
- 'Indeed!' faid the king, 'but, my bonny uncle, she will not spare you.' He then laughingly added, 'However, since we see your love for her is so strong, we will cheerfully affist you in the matter.'

Not long after this, the king ordered the lord de la Riviere, his first knight, steward of his household and chamberlain, to undertake a journey to Béarn, and with him the viscount d'Assy. The duke of Burgundy named, as envoys on his part, the bishop of Autun, and sir William de la Trimouille. The duke of Berry entreated a prudent and valiant knight, count John de Sancerre, to go thither on his part.

These five knights, who were appointed to demand this young lady in marriage, for the duke of Berry, from the count de Foix, lest their homes, and were all to meet at Avignon. They staid with pope Clement, who was cousin-german to the father of the lady, full sisteen days, and about Candlemas departed, taking the road through Nimes and Monipellier to Touloufe.

dlemas

They travelled, with great state and short journies, unto Beziers and Carcassone, where they found the marshal de Sancerre, who received them very magnificently, as was right. He conversed with them concerning the count de Foix, of his assars and establishments, for it was not more than two months since he had returned from thence.

From Carcassone they went to Toulouse, and there remained while they sent messengers to the count de Foix at Orthès. They opened their proposals of marriage, but distantly for at the beginning the count was very cold, on account of the duke of Lancaster, who at the time resided at Bordeaux or Libourne, having made offers of his son, the earl of Derby, for the young lady of Boutogne; and it was thought, from the long time these lords remained at Toulouse, the marriage would not take effect.

They regularly fent daily and weekly accounts of their progrefs, and what answers they received from the count de Foix, to the duke of Berry, who resided at la Nonnette* in Auvergne, and the duke, whose only anxiety was to bring the matter to a conclusion, repeatedly wrote back to press them not to desist until they had completed the business.

The count de Foix, who was wife and fubtle,

* La Monnette, a town in Auvergne, election of Issoire.

feeing the ardour of the duke, treated very coldly, and managed the matter fo well, that, with the confent, and indeed at the entreaty of all parties, he received thirty thousand francs for the time the young lady had been under his care and wardship. He might have had a larger fum, had he demanded it; but he wished to shew moderation, that he might have their thanks, and also that the duke of Berry should feel himself under some obligations to him.

When every thing was concluded, the count de Foix fent the young lady of Boulogne to Morlans, efcorted by five hundred lances under the command of fir Espaign du Lyon, fir Reginald William, fir Peter de Cabestan, fir Adam de Cacasse, fir Manaut Nouailles and fir Peter de Kes. She was there delivered, in the name of the duke of Berry, to the ambassadors from France, who were escorted by the marshal of France with five hundred spears, and there the two parties separated.—
Those from Foix returned home, and the French carried with them the lady.

The duke of Berry had fent to her his array of cars and horses, with every fort of dress and ornament for her head, as if she had been queen of France. I, John Froissart, the author of this history, took my departure from Orthès at the same time with her; for the count de Foix had told me I need not be in a hurry to leave him, for he would take care I should return in good company.

The duchess of Berry, for such I shall henceforth forth call her, continued her journey until she came to Avignon, when she dismounted at lodgings provided for her by the pope at Villeneuve without Avignon. On the morrow, between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, all the cardinals waited on her; when, having mounted a white palfrey the pope had given her, she crossed the bridge over the Rhône in great state, and waited on the pope at his palace at Avignon, who was feated in confittory on his papal throne to receive her. He kided her on the mouth on account of their relationship; and the duchess, with her company, then went to dinner at the hôtel of the cardinal of Turin, below the pope's palace, and there met a great company of cardinals. This was on a Tuefday: the following day the pope entertained her and her attendants at dinner; and this vifit of the duchefs, as I have heard fay, cost the pope ten thousand francs.

On the Friday she supped at the palace, and took leave of the pepe. On the Saturday she departed, and dined and lay at Orange. She continued her journey on horseback, or in a carriage, through Valence and Vienne, to Lyon, where she reposed herself for two whole days. On her departure, she went to la Bresle, then passing through the country of Forèts, came to la Palisse in Burgundy, then to Quissy, to Hanche-sur-Allier, and to Riom in Auvergne, where she likewise remained two days before the duke of Berry arrived. He came this ther in great state the night of Whitsunday, and on that day, at two o'clock in the morning, he was married to her. The marriage was very magnificent, and there were present the count de loulogne, the count d'Estampes and the count dauphin d'Auvergne. The feastings and tournaments lasted for four days, and I, the writer of this book, was a partaker of them all.

CHAP. LV.

CERTAIN PRUDENT MEN NEGOTIATE A TRUCE, FOR THREE YEARS, BETWEEN THE FRENCH AND ENG-LISH, AND ALL THEIR ALLIES.

YOU have heard that a truce had been concluded with all the English garrisons from the Loire to the country beyond the Garonne and Gironde, to last until Saint John the Baptist's day 1369.— During this time, some wise and great lords opened a negotiation for a general truce between France and England, on sea and land, for three years. It was the intention of these persons that all the allies of either side should be included in it, such as the kings of Castille and Scotland, the king of Portugal, and many barons of Upper Gascony. They had much trouble before they could accomplish this; for the Scots would no way listen to it, though, when the proposal was first made by the king of France to the king of Scotland, he himfelf had readily affented, for he wished not for war. He summoned, therefore, the prelates and barons of his realm, to lay the matter before them, as he could not agree to this truce for the kingdom without their consent; and, if he had, they would not have abided by it.

The letters which had been received from the king of France were read in their presence, containing his wish that they would agree with him for a truce of three years. This intelligence was very disagreeable to them, and they said,—'The king of France seems to propose a truce, when it is the moment to continue the war: we have completely defeated the English at Otterbourne; and the season is not so far advanced, but that we may do it again and again.' Many debates ensued, for they were very unwilling to accept of a truce. It was at length resolved to send a bishop and three knights to the king of France and his council, to prevent the treaty from being further advanced, and to offer the friendship of the realm of Scotland.

The bishop of St. Andrews, fir Archibald Douglas, fir William Lindsay and fir John Sinclair, were appointed on this embassy. They departed as speedily as they could, and, having landed at Sluys, rode on to Paris.

They laid their credential letters, from the prelates and barons of Scotland, before the king of France and his council, and were readily liftened to, from the great defire they had to profecute the war against the English. But, notwithstanding this, the treaty was now so far advanced, that they could not retract: the Scots, therefore, had very civil answers given them; but the treaty was, of necessity, completed.

The truce was concluded, through the means of commissioners of high rank on both sides, who held their conferences at Leulinghers, between Boutogne and Calais. In it were included all the allies of France and England, who agreed to preferve the peace inviolate by every means, public or private, for the space of three years.

The commissioners from the king of France were the bishop of Bayeux, count Waleran de Saint Pol, fir William de Melun, fir Nicholas Bracque and fir John le Mercier, who resided at Boulogne. On the part of the king of England were the bishop of Darham, the earl of Salisbury, fir William Beauchamp, governor of Calais, John Lanon, Nicholas de Gaberth and Richard Roesle, clerk and doctor of laws, who remained at Calais. The place of conference, where they mutually assembled, was at Lulinghem, between Boulogne and Calais.

At this period, there was much buftle in France and elsewhere, on account of the splendid feasts king Charles intended holding at Paris, on the entry of his queen Isabella, who had never as yet visited that city. Knights, squires, ladies, and damsels made the richest dresses for the occasion, of all which I will give an exact account, before I say more of the truce that was fairly written out, and sealed by all the parties.

CHAP. LVI.

PROISSART RELATES HIS TRAVELS AFTER HE HAD

LEFT ORTHES.

YOU who take delight in this history must know, that on my leaving the castle of the noble count Gaston de Foix, I returned through Auvergne and France in company with the gallant lord de la Riviere and sir William de la Trimouille, who had conducted the lady Jane of Boulogne to the duke of Berry in the town of Riom, where he had married her, as has been related; for, having been present at all these feasts, I may well speak of them. I went thence to Paris, where I met the noble lord de Coucy, one of my patrons, who had lately married a daughter to the duke of Lorraine.

The lord de Coucy entertained me kindly, and asked many questions about Foix, Béarn, pope Clement, and Avignon as well as concerning the nuptials of the duke of Berry, and of a particular friend of his, and likewise one of my patrons, the lord Berald dauphin of Auvergne. To all his questions I satisfied him as to what I knew, or had seen, infomuch that he was well pleased, and said,—
'You shall come with me into Cambresis, for I am going to a castle the king has given me called Crevecœur: it is two leagues from Cambray, and nine from Valenciennes.' 'The distances are very right, my lord,' replied I, and accepted his offer. On the road, he told me, that the bishop of Bayeux, the count de Saint Pol, fir William de Melun and fir John le Mercier, were at Boulogne by orders from the king of France; and that there were at Calais, on the part of king Richard of England, the bishop of Durham, the earl of Salifbury, fir William Beauchamp governor of Calais, fir John Clambon, fir Nicholas Grandbourg, knights and chamberlains to the king of England, and fir Richard Rocharle * doctor of laws; who had remained at Boulogne and Calais upwards of a month, waiting for commissioners from Scotland, who were not arrived fix days ago, as my cousin Saint Pol writes me word. The king of France has therefore written to king Robert of Scotland, to press him to accept of the truce, for * Clambon,—Grandbourg,—Rocharle. These names are different in almost all the copies, MS. or printed. They are called Lanon, L'asnon—Gaberth, Gunborch—Roolle and Rohale. Lord Berners retains them as in the preceding chapter, but totally omits them in this. The treaty, which is at length in Rymer, has the names as follows. Those from France are also different from Froissart.

The bishop of Durham,—sir William Beauchamp, governor of Calais,—sir John Devereux, steward of the king's household,—fir John Clanvow, sir Nicholas Daggeworth, knights of the king's chamber.

the English will not consent to it unless the Scots be included.

Thus continuing our journey, we came to Crevecœur, where I remained with him three days to repose and refresh myself, when I took leave and went to Valenciennes. After staying there a fortnight, I went to Holland, to vifit my gallant patron and lord the count de Blois, whom I found at Schoenhoven. He made me good cheer, and inquired after news. I told him enough of all I had feen or heard, and was with him upwards of a month, as well at Gouda as Schoenhoven, and then took leave to return to France, to learn the particulars of the conferences that were holding at Leulinghem, between the French and English, and likewife to be prefent at the magnificent feafts that were to be given at queen Isabella's public entry into Paris, where as yet she had never been *.

* Underneath is the translation of a note, vol. iii. p. 85. of M. Levesque's history of the five first kings of the race of Valois.

for No would be tempted to believe from the recitals of our historians, that the queen, who had now been married four years, made this her first entry into Paris. It is a mistake. She was there in 1386, when Charles wrote to her, the 28th April, from Mondidier, to fend to Amiens the amount of the taxes, and to hasten all the men at arms and foreigners that were intended for the invasion of England from Paris. He orders her at the same time to proclaim war against the Flemings and their allies. One may conjecture from this letter, that he had entrusted her with the regency.

To learn the most I could, I travelled through Brabant, and managed to arrive at Paris eight days before the commencement of the feafts. I had fo much forethought, respecting the french and scots lords who had been at the conferences at Leuling. hem, that I made acquaintance with fir William de Melun, who related to me all their transactions. and that the count de St. Pol had paffed over to England to vifit his brother-in-law king Richard, and to have the truce confirmed, which was to last for three years; but he faid he would be here at all events to partake of the feafts. I asked fir William, ' what lords the Scots had fent to the conference; for that in my younger days I had been in Scotland as far as the Highlands, and as at that time I was at the court of king David, I was acquainted with the greater part of the nobility of that country.' He told me, 'that the bishop of Aberdeen, fir James and fir David Lindfay, and fir Walter Sinclair, were the commissioners for Scotland *.' All this I carefully remembered, that I might enregister it in my chronicle, with all I should fee or hear at this grand feast of queen Isabella's entry, the arrangement of which was as follows.

* The fcots commissioners are evidently wrong. The finest MS. in the British Museum has fir Archibald and fir William Lindsay, and fir John Sinclair. But in Rymer there is mention only made of the cardinal of Glasgow and bishop of Dunkeld.

CHAP. LVII.

QUEEN ISABELLA OF FRANCE MAKES HER PUBLIC ENTRY INTO THE CITY OF PARIS.

ON Sunday the 20th day of June*, in the year of our Lord 1399, there were fuch crowds of people in Paris, it was marvellous to fee them; and on this Sunday, the noble ladies of France who were to accompany the queen affembled in the afternoon at Saint Denis, with fuch of the nobility as were appointed to lead the litters of the queen and her attendants. The citizens of Paris, to the amount of twelve hundred, were mounted on horseback, dressed in uniforms of green and crimfon, and lined each side of the road.

Queen Joan and her daughter †, the duchess of

Orleans.

* June. My MSS, and that in the B, Museum have the 20th of August.

† Queen Joan and her daughter. I suspect there must be some mistake, although this paragraph is in all the editions I know of, printed and MS.; but I cannot discover who these personages were, for all the queens of that name were dead, the last of them the preceding year, and the duke of Touraise, the king's brother, succeeded to the title of duke of Orleans on the death of Philip in 1391: he had been lately married to Valentina of Milan, who is mentioned afterwards as forming part of the procession.

Orleans, entered Paris first, about an hour after noon, in a covered litter, and, passing through the great street of Saint Denis, went to the palace where the king was waiting for them, and this day they went no farther.

The queen of France, attended by the duchefs of Berry, the duchefs of Burgundy, the duchefs of Touraine, the duchefs of Lorraine, the countefs of Nevers, the lady of Coucy, with a crowd of other ladies began the procession in open litters ment richly ornamented. The duchefs of Touraine was not in a litter, but to display herself the more, was mounted on a palfrey magnificently caparifoned.

The litter of the queen was led by the dukes of Touraine and Bourbon at the head; the dukes of Berry and Burgundy were at the centre, and the lord Peter de Navarre and the count d'Oftrevant behind the litter, which was open and beautifully ornamented. The duchefs of Touraine followed, on her palfrey, led by the count de la Marche and the count de Nevers, the whole advancing flowly, at a foot's pace After her came the duchefs of Burgundy and her daughter, the lady Margaret of Hainault, in an open litter, led by the lord Henry de Bar, and fir William, the young count de Namur. Then came the duchefs of Berry, and the daughter of the lord de Coucy, in an open and ornamented litter, led by fir James de Bourbon and fir Philip d'Artois. Then the duchefs of Bar and her daughter, led by fir Charles d'Albret and the lord de Coucy. There was no particular mention Vol. IX. A a made made of the other ladies and damfels who followed in covered chariots, or on palfreys, led by their knights. Serjeants, and others of the king's officers, had full employment, in making way for the procession, and keeping off the crowd; for there were such numbers assembled, it seemed as if all the world had come thither.

At the gate of Saint Denis, that opens into Paris, was the representation of a starry sirmament, and within it were children dressed as angels, whose singing and chaunting was melodiously sweet.—There was also an image of the Virgin holding in her arms a child, who at times amused himself with a windmill, made of a large walnut. The upper part of this sirmament was richly adorned with the arms of France and Bavaria, with a brilliant sun dispersing its rays through the heavens; and this sun was the king's device at the ensuing tournaments.*

The queen of France and the ladies took delight in viewing this as they passed, as indeed did all who saw it. The queen then advanced slowly to the sountain, in the street of Saint Denis, which was covered and decorated with sine blue cloth, besprinkled over with golden slower de luces. The pillars that surrounded the sountain were ornamented with the arms of the chief barons of France; and, instead of water, it ran in great ftreams of Clairé * and excellent Piement †. Around this fountain were young girls handfomely dreffed, having on their heads caps of folid gold, who fang fo fweetly, it was a pleasure to hear them; and they held in their hands cups of gold, offering their liquors to all who chose to drink. The queen stopped there to hear and look at them, as did the ladies as they passed by.

* Louis XIV. took the same device, with the motto of ' Nec pluribus impar.'

Below the monastery of the Trinity, there was a scaffold erected in the street, and on this scaffold a caftle, with a representation of the battle with king Saladin, performed by living actors: the Christians on one side, and the Saracens on the other. All the lords of renown, who had been present, were represented with their blazoned warcoats, fuch as were worn in those times. A little above was the person of the king of France, furrounded by his twelve peers, in their proper arms; and when the queen came opposite the scaffold, king Richard was feen to leave his companions and advance to the king of France, to request permiffion to fight the Saracens, which having obtained, he returns to his army, who instantly begin the attack on Saladin and the Saracens. The battle lafted for a confiderable time, and was feen with much pleafure.

The procession then passed on, and came to the fecond gate of Saint Denis*, where, like to the first, there had been made a representation of a richly starred simmament, with the holy Trinity seated in great majesty, and within the heaven little children as angels singing very melodiously.—As the queen passed under the gate, two angels descended from above, holding an extraordinarily rich golden crown, ornamented with precious stones, which they gently placed on the head of the queen, sweetly singing the following verses:

* Clairé,-I cannot find.

† Piement—is a liquor made of honey, wine and different spices,—Du Cange.

' Dame, enclose entre fleurs de Lys, Reine êtes vous de Paris, De France, et de tout le païs. Nous en r'allons en paradis.'

When they came opposite to the chapel of St. James, they found a scaffold erected on the right hand, richly decorated with tapestry, surrounded with curtains, in the manner of a chamber: within which were men who played finely on organs.—
The whole street of Saint Denis was covered with a canopy of rich camlet and silk cloths, as if they had had the cloths for nothing, or were at Alexandria or Damascus. I, the writer of this account, was present, and astonished whence such quantities of rich stuffs and ornaments could have come; for all the houses on each fide the great street of St. Denis, as far as the Châtelet, or indeed to the great bridge*, were hung with tapestries, representing various scenes and histories, to the delight of all beholders.

* Denys Sauvage, in a marginal note, fays, 'that he thinks this gate was called la Porte aux Peintres,' and was pulled down in the reign of Francis I.

It was called Porte aux Peintres, because many painters resided near it.—SAUVAL.

The queen and her ladies, conducted by great lords in their litters, arrived at length at the gate of the Châtelet, where they stopped to see other splendid pageants that had been prepared for them. At the gate of the Châtelet was erected a castle of wood, with towers, strong enough to last forty years. At each of the battlements was a knight completely armed from head to foot; and in the castle was a superb bed, as finely decorated with curtains, and every thing elfe, as if for the chamber of the king, and this bed was called the bed of justice, in which lay a person to represent St. Anne. On the esplanade, before the castle, (which comprehended a tolerably large space) was a warren and much brush-wood, within which were plenty of hares, rabbits and young birds, that fled out and in again for fear of the populace. From this wood, on the fide near the queen, there issued a large white hart, that made for the bed of justice; from another part came forth a lion and eagle, well represented, and proudly advanced towards the stag. Then twelve young maidens, richly dressed, with chaplets of gold on their heads, came out of the wood, holding naked fwords in their hands, and placed themselves between the hart, the lion and eagle, shewing that, with their swords, they were determined to defend the hart and the bed of justice.

* Denys Sauvage fays, he means by the great bridge, the bridge of Nôtre Dame.

The queen, the ladies and lords, having feen this pageant with pleasure, passed on, to the bridge of Nôtre Dame, which was decorated so hand-somely, it could not be amended: it was covered with a starry canopy, of green and crimson, and the streets were all hung with tapestry as far as the church of Nôtre Dame. When the queen and her ladies had passed the bridge, and were near the church, it was late in the evening; for the procession, ever since it had set out from St. Denis, had advanced but a foot's pace.

The great bridge of Paris was hung ail its length with green and white farcenet; but before the queen and her company entered Nôtre Dame, she was presented with other pageants that delighted her and her ladies very much: I will describe them.

A full month before the queen's entry to Paris, a master-engineer from Geneva had fastened a cord to the highest tower of Nôtre Dame, which, passing high above the streets, was fixed to the most elevated house on the bridge of St. Michael. As the queen was passing down the street of Nôtre Dame, this man left the tower, and, seating himself on the cord, descended singing, with two lighted lighted torches in his hand, for it was now dark, to the great aftonishment of all who saw him, how he could do it. He kept the lighted torches in his hands that he might be seen by all Paris, and even two or three leagues off. He played many tricks on the rope, and his agility was highly praised.

The bishop of Paris and his numerous clergy, clothed in their robes, were without the church of Nôtre Dame waiting for the queen, who was helped out of her litter by the four dukes of Berry, Burgundy, Touraine and Bourbon. When the other ladies had left their litters, and dismounted from their palfreys, they all entered the church in grand procession, preceded by the bishop and priests, singing aloud to the praise of God and the virgin Mary.

The queen was conducted through the nave and choir to the great altar, where, on her knees, she made her prayers according as she thought good, and presented, as her offering, four cloths of gold and the handsome crown which the angels had put on her head at the gate of Paris, as has been related. The lord John de la Riviere and sir John le Mercier instantly brought one more rich, with which they crowned her.

This being done, the queen and her ladies returned to their litters, wherein they were feated as before; and, as it was late, there were upwards of five hundred lighted tapers attending the proceffion. In fuch array were they conducted to the palace, where the king, queen Joan, and the duchefs chefs of Orleans, were waiting for them *. The ladies here quitted their litters, and were conducted to different apartments; and the lords, after the dancing, returned to their hôtels†.

On the morrow, which was Monday, the king gave a grand dinner to a numerous company of Froiffart has mentioned them before: but the widow of Charles le Bel died, according to l'Art de Venfier les Dates, at Brie-comte-Robert, 1370, and queen le bena's entry was in 1389.

† Froiffart having omitted a curious circumstance that happened at this entry of the queen, I shall translate it from Les Grands Chroniques de St. Denis.

' The king, having heard what fine pageants were preparing, faid to Savoifi, who was one of his valets de chambre, Savoisi, I beg that thou wouldst mount my good horse, and I will get up behind thee; and we will difguife ourfelves fo that no one shall know us, and go and see the entry of my wife.'--Savoifi did all he could to diffuade the king from this, but the king would be obeyed. They therefore difguifed themselves, and the king rode behind Savoisi to different parts of Paris. -They came to the Châtelet as the queen was paffing, and the crowd was fo great, that Savoifi got into the midft. Bailiffs, armed with flaves, had been flationed there to prevent any harm being done to the pageant, who laid about them most luftily to keep off the crowd. Savoifi and the king, ftill pufling forward, the bailiffs, who knew not the king, gave to each feveral fharp blows on their shoulders. In the evening, the king told the ladies what had happened to him at the Châtelet, and there was much laughing and joking on the occasion among them.'

* Denys Sauvage, in a marginal note, fays, that thi pheen Joan was the widow of Charles le Bel, and her daugh - Branche married to Philip duke of Orleans, brother to the rate sing John.

ladies; and, at the hour of high mass, the queen of France was led by the before-mentioned dukes to the holy chapel, where she was anointed and fanctified as queens of France usually are. Sir William de Viare, archbishop of Rouen, said mass. After mass, which was well and solemnly sung, the king and queen returned to their apartments, as did the other ladies to theirs, who lodged in the palace.

Shortly after the mass, the king, queen and all the ladies entered the hall. You must know, that the great table of marble*, which is in this hall, and is never removed, was covered with an oaken plank four inches thick, and the royal dinner placed thereon. Near the table, and against one of the pillars, was the king's buffet magnificently decked out with gold and filver plate, and much envied by many who saw it. Before the king's table, and at some distance, were wooden bars, with three entrances, at which were serjeants at arms, ushers, and archers, to prevent any from passing them but those who served the table; for in truth, the crowd was so very great, there was no moving but with much difficulty. There were plenty of minstrels, who played away to the best of their abilities.

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;At one end of the hall of the palace was placed a marble table that filled up almost the whole breadth of it, and was of such a fize for length, breadth, and thickness, that it was supposed to be the greatest slab of marble existing.

· It ferved, for two or three hundred years, very different purposes: at one time, for a theatre, on which the attorneys' clerks acted their mummeries, and at another for the royal feasts, where only emperors, kings and princes of the blood were admitted with their ladies: the other great lords dined at feparate tables. It was confumed by fire in 1618.—Sauval Antiquités de Paris.

The kings, prelates and ladies, having washed and feated themselves at table, their places were as follows: the bishop of Noyon was seated at the head of the king's table, then the bishop of Laugres, and then the archbishop of Rouen, by the fide of the king of France, who was that day clothed in a crimfon furcoat, lined with ermine, and the royal crown on his head. A little above the king was the queen, crowned also very richly. Next the queen was placed the king of Armenia, then the duchess of Berry, the duchess of Burgundy, the duchess of Touraine, madame de Nevers, mademoifelle Bonne de Bar, madame de Coucy and Mademoifelle Marie de Harcourt.-There were none others at the king's table, except at the very lower end, the lady de Sully, wife of fir Guy de la Trimouille.

There were two other tables in the hall, at which were feated upwards of five hundred ladies and damfels; but the crowd was fo great, it was with difficulty they could be ferved with their dinner, which was plentiful and fumptuous. Of this it is not worth the trouble to give any particulars; but I must speak of some devices which were curiously arranged, and would have given the king much amusement, had those who had undertaken it been able to act their parts.

In the middle of the hall was erected a castle of wood, wood, forty feet high, twenty feet long, and as many wide, with towers at each corner, and one larger in the middle. This castle was to represent the city of Troy the great, and the tower in the middle, the palace of Ilion, from which were difplayed the banners of the Trojans, such as king Priam, Hector, his other fons, and of those shut up in the place with them. The castle, being on wheels, was very eafily moved about. There was a pavilion likewise on wheels, on which were placed the banners of the grecian kings, that was moved, as it were, by invisible beings, to the attack of Troy. There was also, by way of reinforcement, a large ship well built, and able to contain one hundred men at arms, that, like the two former, was ingeniously moved by invisible wheels. Those in the ship and pavilion made a sharp attack on the castle, which was gallantly defended; but, from the very great crowd, this amusement could not last long. There were fo many people on all fides, feveral were stifled by the heat; and one table, near the door of the chamber of parliament, at which a numerous company of ladies and damfels were feated, was thrown down, and the company forced to make off as well as they could.

The queen of France was near fainting, from the excessive heat, and one of the doors was forced to be thrown open to admit air. The lady of Coucy was in the same situation. The king, noticing this, ordered an end to be put to the feast, when the tables were removed, for the ladies to have more room. Wine and spices were served around, and every one retired when the king and queen went to their apartments. Those ladies who did not lodge in the palace returned to their hôtels, to recover themselves of their sufferings from the heat and crowd.

The lady of Coucy remained in her hôtel until it was late; but the queen, about five o'clock, left the palace, attended by the duchesses before named, and, mounting an open litter, proceeded through the streets of Paris, followed by the ladies in litters or on horseback, to the residence of the king, at the hôtel de St. Pol. She was attended by upwards of one thousand horse. The king took boat at the palace, and was rowed to his hôtel, which though it was fufficiently large, there had been erected in the court, at the entrance leading to the Seine, an immense hall, covered with undressed cloths of Normandy, that had been fent from divers places: the fides were hung with tapestry, that represented strange histories, and gave delight to all who faw them.

In this hall the king entertained the ladies at a banquet; but the queen remained in her chamber, where she supped, and did not again appear that night. The king, lords and ladies, danced and amused themselves until day-break, when the amusements ceased, and every one retired to his home, each of them to sleep and repose themselves, as it was full time.

I will now speak of the presents the Parisians made to the king, queen and duches of Touraine, who was but lately arrived in France from Lombardy: she was called Valentine, and was daughter to the duke of Milan. She had this year been married to the duke of Touraine, and had never been in Paris before this public entry of the queen; the citizens, therefore, were bound to bid her welcome.

About twelve o'clock, forty of the principal citizens of Paris, all uniformly dreffed, waited on the king at his hotel of Saint Pol, bringing a prefent they had difplayed through the streets of the town. Their gift was in a very richly worked litter, borne by two strong men dreffed as favages. This litter was covered with a transparent crape of filk, through which might be seen the magnificent things it contained.

On their arrival, they advanced to the king's chamber (which was open and ready prepared to receive them, as their coming was known, and welcome is always made to those who bring gifts); and, having placed the litter on tressels in the midst of the apartment, they cast themselves on their knees, and thus spoke: "Most beloved lord and king, your citizens of your good town of Paris present to you the plate that is contained in this litter, as tokens of their joy that you have taken the government of the kingdom into your own hands.'

'Many thanks, my good people,' replied the king: 'they are fair and rich.' The citizens then rose up, and, having taken leave of the king, withdrew. When they were gone, the king said to fir William

William des Bordes and to Montaigu*, who were then present, 'Let us go nearer, and examine what their gifts are.' They approached, and looked into the litter. I will now mention what presents it contained.

First, there were four pots of gold, four faucers to match, four golden falts, twelve cups of the

* M. Levefque fays, that Charles owed his popularity to the wife choice he had made of the under-mentioned ministers.— La Riviere, who had deferved the friendship of the wifest of kings:—Noviant, charged with the superintendance of the finances, was of the order of nobility, though without fortune,—and Montaigu, born in obscurity, raised himself by his talents;—but, above all, the duke of Bourbon, who had preferved his integrity, though he had been joined in the regency with the dukes of Berry and Burgundy.

&#x27;This John de Montaigu, grand mafter of the household, and superintendant of the sinances to Charles VI. was accused of having robbed the king, and was condemned to be beheaded. This was done without the king's knowledge, at the instigation of the duke of Burgundy and the king of Navarre. He was beheaded in the market-place of Paris, the 17th October 1409, and his remains were carried to the gibbet at Montsaucon, where they remained hanging for nearly three years, since his body was not taken down until the 17th September 1412, and carried to the convent of the Celestins of Marcoussi, which he had founded.

&#x27;Although he was executed without the knowledge of the king, he did not the lets allow the confication of his property, to be given to Louis, duke de Guienne, dauphin.

&#x27;I was, however, informed by M. Perron, who has carefully applied himfelf to learn the particulars of the life of this lord, that his property was reflored to his heirs.'—Mena-Giana.

fame, twelve porringers, and fix diffes of gold also: the whole weighed one hundred and fifty marcs.

Another party of citizens, very handsomely equipped in uniforms of cloth, waited on the queen, and presented her with a litter borne by two men dressed, one as a bear, the other as a unicorn, which they placed in her chamber, and the citizens recommended their town and inhabitants to her protection. This present confisted of the model of a ship in gold, two large slaggons of gold, two comfit boxes, two salts, fix cups, and as many saucers, all of gold: twelve lamps of silver, two silver basins, two dozen of silver porringers, the same number of silver cups: the whole weight of gold and silver being three hundred marcs.

The third present was carried, in like manner, to the chamber of the duches of Touraine, by two men representing Moors, having their faces blackened, and richly dressed with white turbans, as if they had been Saracens or Tartars. This litter was ornamented, and covered, like the others, with gauze, and accompanied by twelve citizens in uniforms, who presented the duches with a ship in gold, a large slaggon of gold, two comfit boxes, two large dishes, and two falts, all of gold: six jugs of silver, and two dozen cups and saucers of the same: the whole weighing two hundred marcs.

The duchess of Toursine was exceedingly pleased with this present, as she had reason, for it was very magnimagnificent, and returned handsomely her thanks to those who had brought it, and to the good city of Paris that had given it to her.

Such were the gifts made this Tuefday to the king and queen of France, and to the duchefs of Touraine. You may judge from them the liberality and riches of the Parifians; for it was affured me, the author of this history, that all these presents which I saw had cost upwards of fixty thousand golden crowns.

When these ceremonies were concluded, the hour for dinner arrived; but this day the king and his court dined in private at their different hotels, for at three o'clock the tournament was to take for at three o'clock the tournament was to take place in the fquare of Saint Catherine, where fcaffolds had been erected for the accommodation of the queen and the lodies the queen and the ladies.

I will name the knights of this grand tournament, who were flyled the Knights of the Golden Sun, which, although it was that day the king of France's device, was borne by others, who tilted in hopes of gaining the prize. These knights were thirty, including the king; first, the duke of Berry, the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Bourbon, the count de la Marche, fir James de Bourbon his brother, fir William de Namur, fir Oliver de Clisson constable of France, fir John de Vienne, fir James de Vienne lord d'Espaigny, fir Guy de la Trimouille, fir William de la Trimouille his brother, fir Philip de Bar, the lord de Rochesort a Breton, the lord de Rais, the lord de Beaumanoir, fir John de Barbençon called the Ardenois, the halze of Flanders, the lord de Torcy a Normand, fir John des Barres, the lord de Nantouillet, the lord de la Rochefoucault, the lord de Garencieres, fir John de Harpedant, the baron d'Ury, fir William Marciel, fir Reginald de Roye, fir Geoffry de Carin, fir Charles de Changiet and fir William de Lignac.

All these knights were sumptuously dressed, and each had on his shield a splendid sun. At three o'clock, they entered the square of St. Catherine, where the queen had already arrived in a magnisticent car, and the duchesses and other ladies in great state, and taken their places on the seats prepared for them. The king of France next made his appearance completely equipped for tilting, of which amusement he was very fond.

The justs now began, and were carried on with vigour, for there were many knights from foreign parts. Sir William de Hainault, count d'Ostrevant, tilted right well, as did those knights who had accompanied him, such as the lord de Gommines, fir John d'Andregines, the lord de Cantan, sir Ansel de Transsegines and sir Clinquart de Herinno. Every one performed his part, in honour of the ladies; and the duke of Ireland tilted well: being then a resident at Paris, the king had invited him to the tournament. A german knight from beyond the Rhine, called sir Gervais de Mirande, gained great commendation.

The number of knights made it difficult to give a full stroke, and the dust was so troublesome that it increased their difficulties. The lord de Coucy Vol. IX.

B b shope

shone with brilliancy. The tilts were continued without relaxation until night, when the ladies were conducted to their hôtels.

The queen of France and her attendants were led back to the hôtel of St. Pol, where was the most magnificent banquet for the ladies ever heard of. The feast and dancing lasted until sun-rise, and the prize of the tournament was given, with the affent of the ladies and heralds, to the king, as being the best tilter on the opponents' side, and the prize for the holders of the lists was given to the halze de Flandres, bastard-brother to the duches of Burgundy.

On account of the complaints the knights made of the dust which had prevented many from exerting themselves to the utmost at the late tournament, the king ordered the lists to be watered.—Two hundred water-carriers were employed on the Wednesday to water the square, but, notwithstanding their efforts, there was still a sufficiency of dust.

The count de St. Pol arrived this Wednesday straight from England, having made haste to be present at these feasts, and had left fir John de Chatel-morant to follow with the treaty of the truce. The count de St. Pol was kindly received by the king and his lords: his countess, who had been near the person of the queen at these festivals, was rejoiced at his arrival.

In the afternoon of the Wednesday, thirty fquires, who had been in attendance the preceding day, advanced to the lists where the tournaments had been held, whither the ladies also came, in the same state, and seated themselves as before. The tilting was ably and vigorously kept up until night, when the company returned to their homes. The banquet this evening at the hôtel de St. Pol was as grand as the preceding one, and the prize was adjudged by the ladies and heralds to a squire from Hainault, who had accompanied the count d'Ostrevant, called John de Flaron, as the most deserving of the opponents, and to a squire belonging to the duke of Burgundy, called John de Poulceres, for the best of the tenants of the field.

The tournament was continued on the Thurfday, when knights and fquires tilted promifcuoufly, and many gallant justs were done, for every one took pains to excel. Night put an end to it, and there was a grand entertainment again for the ladies, at the hôtel de St. Pol, when the prize for the opponents was given to fir Charles des Armoyes, and for the tenants, to a fquire attached to the queen, called Lons.

On the Friday, the king feasted the ladies and damsels at dinner, which was very splendid and plentiful. Towards the end of it, as the king was seated at table, with the duchess of Berry, the duchess of Burgundy, the duches of Touraine, the countess de Saint Pol, the lady of Coucy, and many more, two knights, completely armed, entered the hall, (which was very spacious, having been, as I have said, erected for the occasion) on barded horses, with lances in their hands. One was sir Reginald de Roye, the other fir Boucicaut the younger. Having tilted bravely for some time, they were joined by fir William de Namur, fir Charles des Armoyes, the lord de Garencieres, the lord de Nantouillet, fir John de Barbençon and several others, who gallantly tilted for two hours before the king and ladies; and, when they had sufficiently amused themselves, they returned to their hôtels.

The ladies and damfels took their leave, this Friday, of the king and queen, as did fuch lords as pleafed, and returned to their homes. The king and queen thanked very graciously such as took leave, for having come to this feast.

END OF THE NINIH VOLUME.

WORKS

LATELY PUBLISHED BY LONGMAN, HURST, REES, AND ORME, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

1.

THE ANNUAL REVIEW,

AND HISTORY OF LITERATURE;

Containing a Critical Analysis of all the Works published during the Year, arranged in Chapters, corresponding with the various Branches of Human Knowledge, each of which is preceded by an Historical Introduction. (To be continued annually.)

A. AIKIN, Editor.

Vol. IV. for 1805, in Royal Octavo, Price 11. 15, in extra Boards.

2.

A HISTORY OF IRELAND,

From the earliest Accounts to the Accomplishment of the Union with Great Britain, in 1801.

By the Rev. JAMES GORDON,

Author of the History of the Rebellion in Ireland, and Rector of Killegny, in the Diocese of Ferns, and of Cannaway, in the Diocese of Cork.

In Two Vols. Octavo, Price 11. 4s. in Boards.

3.

RECOLLECTIONS OF PARIS,

In the Years 1802, 3, 4, and 5.
By J. PINKERTON.

In Two Volumes, Octavo, Price il. is. in Boards.

4.

NOTES ON THE WEST INDIES;

Written during the Expedition under the Command of the late General Sir Ralph Abercromby; including Observations on the Island of Burbadoes, and the Settlements captured by the British Troops upon the Coast of Guiana; likewise Remarks relating to the Creoles and Slaves of the Western Colonies, and the Indians of South America; with occasional Hints regarding the Seasoning or Yellow Fever of Hot Climates.

By GEORGE PINCKARD, M.D.

Of the Royal College of Physicians, Deputy Inspector General of Hospitals to his Majesty's Forces, and Physician to the Bloomsbury Dispensatory.

In Three Volumes, Octavo, Price 1l. 10s. in Boards.

"Though the Author has given to his Observations the modest Title of 'Notes,' they are certainly deserving a higher Character. There appears throughout an ardent desire for Information, considerable Industry in collecting it, and much Facility and Perspicuity in communicating the Result of his Inquiries. The Style is easy and simple, and the Letters are highly deserving Perusal. This Work will be found generally interesting, as it gives a good View of the State of the West-India Settlements; but it will be found more particularly worthy of the Attention of those who wish to add to their Information with respect to Slavery, and West-India Diseases."

LITERARY JOURNAL, May, 1806.

5.

THE POETICAL WORKS

Of Sir DAVID LINDSAY, of the Mount;

Lion King at Arms, under JAMES V.

A New Edition, corrected and enlarged; with a Life of the Author; Prefatory Dissertations; and an appropriate Glossary.

By GEORGE CHALMERS, F.R.S.F.S.A.

In Three Volumes, Crown Octavo, Price 11. 16s. in Boards.

6.

Essays on the Anatomy of Expression in Painting. By CHALES BELL.

CONTAINING,

- 1. Of the Uses of Anatomy to the Painter. Of the Study of the Antique, and of the Academy Figure.
- 2. Of the Skull. Of the Distinctions of Character in different Ages. Comparison of the Antique with Natural Character.
  - 3 and 4. Of the Muscles of the Face in Man and Animals.
- 5. Of the Expression of Passion as illustrated by a Comparison of the Muscles of the Face in Man and Animals. Of the Muscles peculiar to Man, and their Effects in bestowing Human Expression.
- 6. Of the individual Passions. And of the Action of the Muscles expressive of these Passions.
- 7. General View of the Œconomy of the Human Body as it relates to Expression in Painting.
- *** The Subjects are illustrated by Sketches of the Bones, and of the Forms of the Head. Of the Muscles. Of the Expression of the Face in the several Passions, &c.

In One Volume, Quarto, with Engravings after Drawings by the Author, Price 21. 2s. in Boards.

7.

An Account of the Life and Writings of JAMES BEATTIE, LL.D.

Professor of Moral Philosophy and Logic in the Marischal College and University of Aberdeen;

Containing many of his ORIGINAL LETTERS.

By Sir WILLIAM FORBES, of Pitsligo, Bart.
One of the Executors of Dr. Beattic.

- Handsomely printed by Ballantyne, in Two Volumes Quarto, with a fine Engraving, from a capital Painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and fac similes of the Author's Hand-writing, Price 21. 12s. 6d. extra Boards.
- ** A few Copies are printed on Royal Paper, with Proof Impressions of the Plates, Price 51. 58. Boards.

8.

The Complete Works, in Philosophy, Politics, and Morals,

Of Dr. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN;

With Memoirs of his Early Life. Written by HIMSELF.

In Three large Volumes, Octavo, with Sixteen Engravings, and a Portrait of the Author, Price 11, 16s, in Boards.

The Works of Dr. Franklin have been often partially collected, but never before brought together in one uniform Publication.

In the present Volumes will be found all the different Collections, together with the various Papers of the same Author that have been published in separate Pamphlers, or inserted in Foreign Collections of his Works, or in the Translations of our own, or of Foreign Philosophical Societies, or in our own or Foreign Newspapers and Magazines, as far as discoverable by the Editor, who has been assisted in the Research by a Gentleman in America. Among these Papers, some we conceive will be new to the English Reader on this Side the Atlantic.

Also, just published,

A new and improved Edition, elegantly printed in Two Vols. Foolscap Octavo, with a Portrait, price 8s. Boards, of the LIFE and ESSAYS of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, LL.D.

9.

Essays in a Series of Letters to a Friend. By the Rev. JOHN FOSTER.

The Third Edition, in Two Volumes, 12mo, Price 9s. in Boards.

- "To declare at once our opinion of this book, we must say, that we have seldom perused any publication with more pleasure. He is, on the whole, a most masterly writer, perspicuous, acute, profound, and eloquent. He appears, in every page, the warm supporter of the best interests of mankind; he writes with a degree of feeling and energy, which is highly captivating. His style is uncommonly excellent."

  Anti-Jacobin Review, Jan. 1806.
- "We are highly gratified when we meet with a writer, who, to a fund of profound and original thought, together with just views of religion and of morals, joins the talent of recommending his ideas by the graces of imagination, and the powers of eloquence. Such a writer we have the happiness of reviewing at present."

ECLECTIC REVIEW, Nov. 1805.

"Almost every page indicates a more than ordinary penetration into the springs of human nature, and a bold and original mode of thinking on all subjects. His style is vigorous. Readers of every class will find in the perusal of these volumes a rich store of entertainment and instruction."

Annual Review, 1805.

940.4 F92715 v. 9